The Immigration Act 2016, s 67 (sometimes referred to as the ‘Dubs amendment’, after Lord Dubs, who introduced it in response to the plight of children affected by the refugee crisis) provides that: ‘The Secretary of State must, as soon as possible after the passing of this Act, make arrangements to relocate to the United Kingdom and support a specified number of unaccompanied refugee children from other countries in Europe.’

On 6 July 2018, changes to the Immigration Rules, including a new rule 352ZA, came into effect, establishing a system for granting leave to remain to children brought to the UK pursuant to Immigration Act 2016, s 67. The new rules provide for the granting of five-year residence permits with the potential for the young person (and their dependents) to be granted indefinite leave to remain thereafter.

To complement this, on 9 July 2018, the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2018, SI 2018/730 came into force, allowing this group to access mainstream housing and homelessness assistance from their local housing authority. This will be achieved by means of two new classes of eligible person: class G (in respect of the allocation of social housing) and class H (in respect of homelessness assistance). These classes are added to regulations 3 and 5(1) respectively of the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006, SI 2006/1294. The text of the Regulations, as amended, appears at Appendix 2 of this book.

On 18 June 2018, the Ministry of Housing, Communities and Local Government wrote to all Chief Executives, Chief Housing Officers and Chief Officers for Children’s Services of Local Authorities in England, explaining the changes and the role that local housing authorities and children’s services are expected to play in implementing them.

Chapter 3 and Chapter 11 of this text should be read with these changes in mind.
Preface to the Fifth Edition

Each successive edition of this book has been framed by the context of a continuing housing crisis in England and Wales. Like its predecessors, this edition is intended to help those readers who are dealing with the two starkest aspects of that housing crisis – the need to make provision for the homeless and the difficulties in securing an allocation of housing from the dwindling social rented sector.

It is no accident that the first chapters of this book focus on access to social housing. The demand for such housing still far outstrips supply. Many thousands of people are desperate to gain even a chance to be allocated a home from a council or housing association landlord. Among them are many applicants exhausted by a sequence of short-term and insecure stays in privately rented homes. But the social landlords to which they look have, not least as a result of the ‘right to buy’ and heavily limited new-build programmes, only a diminishing stock in which vacancies become available. In England, in the last full year (2016/2017), lettings by councils fell by 9% – a continuation of their long-term trend. Lettings by housing associations decreased by 11% – continuing the fall from the previous year. There is less, not more, but demand is accelerating.

It is precisely because the crisis in social housing is becoming ever more acute, that this edition opens with nearly 300 pages of legal text devoted to helping social landlords, applicants and their advisers to work through the law and procedure related to allocation of social housing. The material has been reviewed and revised to include all the latest case law and other developments.

The ‘right’ approach to social housing allocation remains a matter of both political and legal controversy. It had been anticipated that our highest court, the UK Supreme Court, might agree to hear another wide-ranging appeal on the topic but, just before this work went to the publishers, that opportunity was lost. The Court refused permission to appeal and, in effect, ‘parked’ several of the key issues for determination in later cases. Meanwhile, this text should offer some help as to steer the reader through the legal maze of the world of social housing allocation.

2 R (on the application of H and others) (Appellants) v Ealing London Borough Council (Respondent) UKSC 2017/0209. Permission to appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (see [2017] EWCA Civ 1127) was refused on 15 March 2018.
Preface to the Fifth Edition

It is no less tragic that the remaining 1000 pages of text in this edition, excluding the appendices, have had to be devoted to the topic of help for the homeless in England and Wales.

Since the last edition of this text, central government has accepted the need to improve the legal framework of arrangements for homelessness in England so as to address, at an earlier stage, the prevention of homelessness. The result is the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017. To make the most of the commencement of its provisions in April 2018, local housing authorities in England needed early guidance, training and resources for implementation. As usual, it has been a case of too little, too late. Chapter 15 outlines the new provisions and offers such illumination as the authors can.

Much might have been learned from the earlier implementation of similar legislative arrangements for homelessness prevention in Wales (described in Chapter 17). But that opportunity for cross-learning from experience, in framing new law, has not been taken by government either. It has been left to the authors of this work, and other independent commentators, to offer what help they can – both to users of the new services and to those expected to provide them. This edition of this work contains what I hope will be the essential and accessible material to guide the reader around the new arrangements.

The new legislation was itself the trigger for the long overdue replacement of previous statutory guidance on homelessness in England which had fallen out-of-date by a decade. The issue of the new Code of Guidance has required a comprehensive revision of every element of this book that deals with homelessness. Just as that revision was being completed, there were two further, long overdue, revised guidance documents – one dealing with homeless teenagers, the other with referrals of the homeless between local housing authorities. Thankfully, it has been able to capture their provisions in the revised text.

Of course, this new fifth edition also updates the chapters on homelessness with significant commentary on much new and developing case law. None of us, however, can stem the tide of ever more obscure statutory changes to the eligibility arrangements for homelessness assistance and, until the next edition, readers will have to work as best they can with such complexities as the recently enacted Persons Subject to Immigration Control (Housing Authority Accommodation and Homelessness) (Amendment) Order 2018, SI 2018/729 and the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England)

4 Prevention of homelessness and provision of accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless and/or require accommodation (Ministry of Housing, Communities and Local Government and the Department for Education, April 2018).

5 Procedures for referrals of homeless applicants to another local authority (Local Government Association, May 2018).

On a happier note, the preparation of this edition has seen further significant and positive changes to the writing team. The initial co-authors, myself and Liz Davies, were joined for the last edition by Connor and, for this edition, have had the considerable additional benefit of writing by Tessa. This work is dedicated to the readers whom all of us serve – advisers and housing staff trying their very best to uphold the legal rights of those seeking access to housing in a very demanding context. We hope our writing is of some little help.

Introduction

This fifth edition of Housing Allocation and Homelessness: Law and Practice is published shortly after the amendments to the Housing Act 1996, Part 7, inserted by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017) have come into force. We welcome the new approach in the HRA 2017. More assistance from local housing authorities should now be available to those homeless persons who, for example, are not deemed to be vulnerable or do not have dependent children. The HRA 2017 also emphasises early assistance, with the laudable aim of helping people to avoid homelessness altogether. If, in a few years’ time, there will be fewer people hitting the crisis point of homelessness in the first place, as its sponsor, Bob Blackman MP, hopes, then the HRA 2017 will have been a success. We applaud the homelessness charity, Crisis, and other groups who drew up the HRA 2017 and worked hard to steer it through Parliament.

The HRA 2017 draws on the Welsh legislation, namely the Housing (Wales) Act 2014, Part 2, which came into force in April 2015. Overall, the experience in Wales has been positive. Two-thirds of households have been helped to prevent their homelessness, and two-fifths of applicants have been helped to find alternative accommodation. Significantly, it is reported that the culture of local housing authorities has changed, with the ethos being towards a more preventative, person-centred and outcome-focused approach. This change in culture has assisted groups of applicants who were previously ignored, particularly adults without children (Homelessness Monitor: Wales, Crisis, 2017).

The HRA 2017 forms part of a wider policy agenda to tackle homelessness generally and rough sleeping in particular. The end of 2017 saw the government announce a target of halving rough sleeping by 2022 and eliminating it completely by 2027. The adoption of this target has been accompanied by the appointment of various rough sleeping teams, task forces and advisory panels.

We very much hope that these announcements and appointments prove to be more than just fine words, because urgent action is needed. Both official statistics and everyday experience paint a bleak picture of homelessness in 2018. In both England and Wales, the levels of rough sleeping are rising, a phenomenon that is visible in most towns and cities. The winter of 2017–18 saw a number of well-reported instances of rough sleepers freezing to death. The number of homeless households placed in temporary accommodation in England has risen constantly since 2010. Nearly 6,000 of those households are accommodated in bed and breakfast style accommodation and, of those, around 2,000 are households with dependent children, a significant proportion of whom have been living in such accommodation for longer than the six-week statutory limit. Homelessness campaigners draw attention to the ‘hidden homeless’, who do not feature in these statistics, who have not sought help from local housing authorities or whose applications were not accepted, and who sleep on friends’ floors or sofas, moving from place to place.

Against this backdrop, we agree with Shelter, Crisis, and other housing campaigners that much more is needed in order to resolve homelessness. An increased supply of genuinely affordable accommodation is necessary, including social housing let at low rents, and more emergency and easily accessible accommodation. Local housing authorities also need adequate resources in order to carry out their new duties effectively. Many consider that the government’s additional funding of £72 million to finance the HRA 2017 is simply not enough effectively to implement the new duties.

We also agree that homelessness cannot be eliminated without a serious political commitment to tackle poverty. For some years now, the most frequent cause of homelessness has been the loss of an assured shorthold tenancy, the most common, and one of the most precarious, forms of tenancy available in the private sector. Frequently such tenancies end because the landlord wishes to increase the rent to a level which is unaffordable to the tenant. The combination of the freeze in the local housing allowance, the benefit cap, and rising market rents has made the private rented sector unaffordable for too many. Preventing homelessness by helping to keep people in their existing homes requires significant resources to ensure that those homes are affordable for those on low incomes. The time may also have come to reconsider rent regulation and security of tenure in the private sector more generally. In saying this, we are mindful that the HRA 2017 encourages the use of private sector accommodation as a means to tackle homelessness to a greater extent than ever before. It is imperative that the new measures do not simply create a revolving door to homelessness.

This book cannot begin to tackle these political issues around homelessness. However, we hope that it provides a guide to the intricacies of the duties on local housing authorities in both England and Wales. Since April 2015, the two jurisdictions have diverged in respect of homelessness law, but not the law on allocation on social housing. Part 1 – allocation of social housing – therefore considers the two jurisdictions together, with acknowledgement where there are legal differences. In Part 2 – homelessness – most of the chapters deal with the law as applicable in both England and in Wales. However, there are two new chapters setting out the new duties on local housing authorities in England. Chapter 15 contains the duties to help applicants in England: the new prevention and relief duties. Chapter 16 contains the new, and amended, duties to accommodate applicants in England. Chapter 17 describes the similar duties for local housing authorities in Wales.

The fifth edition of this book has been written by ourselves, without the direct assistance of HHJ Luba QC. He remains a contributing author, however, since much of the text still derives from earlier editions of this book. He and Liz Davies began this project and we are grateful for the work put into earlier editions, allowing us to build on those foundations, and for his constant encouragement. He has provided a preface to this edition. Tessa Buchanan has stepped in to fill his shoes.

As always, we are grateful to our publishers and our editor at LexisNexis.
Our professional colleagues and clerks have been long-suffering, as we endeavoured to manage our legal practices and our writing commitments. We have benefitted from collective discussions of the new duties with our housing law colleagues at Garden Court Chambers and thank them for their insight. Any mistakes, of course, are our sole responsibility.

Inevitably, our families have had to shoulder the burden of sharing their lives with distracted legal writers. We apologise and thank them for their love and support, without which this project would not be possible.

PREFACE TO THIS PART OF THE BOOK

1.1 The first part of this book is concerned with the process of distribution, or ‘allocation’, of tenancies of social housing in England and Wales. The topic is not free of political controversy or legal complexity. As a former President of the UK Supreme Court has said:

  ‘The allocation of social housing is a difficult and potentially controversial matter, which gives rise to very hard choices, at all levels of decision making, whether strategic, policy or specific.’

1.2 The important role of housing allocation in shaping communities has been repeatedly recognised. The most recent statutory guidance for England states that:

  ‘Social housing – stable and affordable – is of enormous importance for the millions who live in it now and for those who look to it to provide the support they need in future. The way it is allocated is key to creating communities where people choose to live and are able to prosper.”

1 Providing social housing for local people: statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local authorities in England (DCLG, December 2013) (the Supplementary English Code) reproduced in Appendix 1 of this book.

1.3 Similarly, the statutory guidance for Wales makes clear that:

‘The Welsh Government believes that the allocation of housing can play an important role in broader regeneration, sustainability and inclusion. For example, allocations can make a contribution towards meeting the objectives set out in a local authority’s Homelessness Strategy, Housing Strategy and Community Strategy. It recognises that allocation schemes will need to form part of an integrated range of measures and initiatives to address social issues at the local level.”

1.4 The rest of this opening chapter introduces the topic of allocation, relates some of its history, and ventures some comments about possible future developments relating to housing allocation. Until relatively recently, the law relating to social housing allocation applied in precisely the same way in both England and Wales. However, that is no longer the case and the text of this part of this book seeks to explain the differences in the way the law now operates in each of the two countries.

1.5 The five chapters which follow provide a detailed analysis of every stage of the allocation process. Readers seeking the primary source materials on social housing allocation, rather than descriptive text, will find that we have gathered in the Appendices and on the CD Rom the essential statutory materials, the statutory Codes of Guidance and other relevant documents.

INTRODUCTION

1.6 For the purposes of this part of this book, ‘social housing’ is taken to embrace the portfolio of residential accommodation for rent held by local authority landlords and by other providers of social housing. In this part of this book the term ‘private registered provider’ or ‘registered social landlord’ is used to refer to social landlords other than local authorities. These landlords are mainly, but not exclusively, housing associations.

1 A term now technically defined, for other purposes, by the Housing and Regeneration Act 2008, s 68(1).

2 The term ‘private registered provider’ is used in England and the term ‘registered social landlord’ is used in Wales. Therefore, to embrace all non-local authority social landlords whether operating in England or Wales, the modern statutory language uses the rubric ‘a private registered provider of social housing or a registered social landlord’: eg Housing Act 1996, s 159(4A)(b) (HA 1996).

1.7 In both England and Wales the allocation of most social housing is organised through the ‘local housing authority’ for the area in which the housing is situated. These local housing authorities not only allocate their own stock (if they have any)\(^2\) but also make nominations to other social landlords such as local housing associations and housing co-operatives.

1.8 This Part of this book deals with:

1. how local housing authorities which hold their own stock of properties allocate the homes that they have available to rent;

2. lettings arising from nominations made by local housing authorities to other providers of social housing (which are the most numerically significant form of letting for those landlords); and

3. direct allocations, by private registered providers or registered social landlords, of their remaining vacancies\(^1\).

1. For a historical perspective, see also Chapter 10 of Alder & Handy Housing Association Law and Practice (Sweet & Maxwell, 4th edn, 2003) and Robert Latham ‘Allocating social housing: the registered social landlord context’ (2008) October Legal Action, p 42.

1.9 Local housing authorities in many areas face a difficult task in the distribution of their available rented homes. Demand for such social housing often far exceeds supply, and the supply of affordable housing has been generally diminishing\(^1\). Pressure on what remains of the stock is increasing\(^2\). Pressure on what remains of the stock is increasing\(^2\).

1.10 In each local housing authority area, those seeking the allocation of social housing will include, among many others:
1.10 Allocation of Social Housing: An Overview

(1) applicants for Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996), Pt 7 (Homelessness) or Housing (Wales) Act 2014 (H(W)A 2014), Pt 2 (Homelessness) assistance who are in temporary accommodation provided by the local housing authority;
(2) people staying with family or friends but needing a home of their own;
(3) tenants in the private sector who occupy unsuitable accommodation or who want the relative permanence of a secure or assured tenancy in social housing;
(4) tenants of social housing who may occupy unsuitable or overcrowded accommodation, or who may need to move for work or family reasons;
(5) people from outside a local housing authority’s own area needing to move into it; and
(6) rough sleepers.

1 As amended by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017), for applications for homelessness assistance made to a local housing authority in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 See Chapters 7, 16 and 17.

1.11 All of those people may apply to the local housing authority and ask that they be allocated somewhere suitable and secure to live.

1.12 Local housing authorities can meet some of that demand by selecting applicants for secure or introductory tenancies of properties from their own stock (if they hold any), or by nominating applicants to other local housing authorities or to other social landlords. Each time a local housing authority selects an applicant, or nominates in this way, it has, in legal terms, ‘allocated’ accommodation.

1 Subject to exceptions set out at HA 1996, s 159(4A) and (4B) (England), s 159(5) (Wales), s 160(2) and (3) and in regulations; see 1.23–1.27.

1.13 How does the local housing authority decide which deserving case gets priority over other deserving cases and therefore who should get the next available property? The answer, in broad terms, is that each local housing authority is free to draw up its own policy on how it will prioritise its applicants, provided that the policy adopted complies with certain statutory requirements and with basic legal principles of fairness and rationality.

HISTORY

Allocation law prior to April 1997

1.14 Before 1 April 1997, local housing authorities could organise the allocation of social housing as they saw fit, subject only to legal principles of rationality and fairness, their statutory duties towards applicants for homelessness assistance under what is now HA 1996, Pt 7 (England) and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, (Wales) and a long-standing statutory obligation to give reasonable preference to certain groups. Provided that they complied with those obligations, the priority accorded to different groups of applicants was left to the discretion of each local housing authority. Local housing authorities also enjoyed a general discretion as to when, and in what circumstances, they would exclude certain applicants from consideration for the allocation of... social housing. Commonly, local housing authorities would use this discretion to exclude applicants who were in rent arrears, or who had a history of nuisance behaviour. Many also operated policies suspending applicants from consideration if they refused a certain number of offers of suitable accommodation or for other reasons.

1 When HA 1996, Pt 6 came into force.
2 As amended by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017), for applications for homelessness assistance made to a local housing authority in England on or after 3 April 2018. It was then Housing Act 1985, Pt III.
3 Re-enacted in Housing Act 1985, s 22 and giving reasonable preference to: those occupying insanitary or overcrowded houses; those with large families; those living in unsatisfactory housing conditions; and applicants for homelessness assistance to whom duties were owed.
4 Housing Act 1985, s 21 vests the general management of its houses in a local housing authority.
5 R v Canterbury City Council ex p Gillespie (1986) 19 HLR 7, QBD.

1.15 The decisions of the courts and the Ombudsmen about the operation of social housing allocation before April 1997 now offer little relevant guidance on the correct application of the current statutory regimes.

Allocation law between April 1997 and January 2003

1.16 From 1 April 1997, HA 1996, Pt 6, (‘Allocation of Housing Accommodation’) as enacted provided a new statutory basis for the allocation of social housing by local housing authorities in England and Wales. The big change was the requirement for local housing authorities to maintain a ‘Housing Register’ – one list that would contain all the different applicants entitled to be considered for an allocation of social housing, except internal applicants for transfer. Within the list of applicants held on that register, local housing authorities were required to give reasonable preference to particular groups. Importantly, no specific preference was required to be given to applicants entitled to assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7 (‘Homelessness’), thereby abandoning the explicit statutory duty to that effect which had been contained in the earlier Housing Act 1985. At the same time, HA 1996, Pt 7, had introduced the concept that local housing authorities’ duties to applicants for assistance under that Part (who had a priority need and had not become homeless intentionally) were simply to provide accommodation for a period of two years. The idea was that applicants for assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7, would be provided with safety-net accommodation and, during those two years, they would either rise to the top of the list of those on the local housing register and be allocated social housing accommodation or would find their own accommodation in the private sector. Homelessness was no longer to be an automatic passport into long-term social housing. Some of that changed with the election of a new government (in May 1997), and, from 1 November 1997, the effect of a ministerial order was that homeless people, who were in priority need and had not become homeless intentionally, were included among the groups of people to whom ‘reasonable preference’ had to be given in the allocation of social housing.

1 HA 1996, s 162(1), as originally enacted.
1.17 Allocation of Social Housing: An Overview

1.17 Subject to those ‘reasonable preferences’, however, a local housing authority could draw up its own policies as to how to recognise the different types of need for an allocation of accommodation among those on the housing register. Local housing authorities could also continue to operate policies excluding certain categories of applicants, provided that they scrutinised each applicant’s case individually and fairly¹. Many local housing authorities therefore continued to operate policies, adopted before 1997, of excluding people with rent arrears and those who had committed acts of nuisance, and of suspending applicants who had refused offers of accommodation². They were also entitled to operate policies excluding applicants from outside their own areas³. Local housing authorities were additionally required by statute to exclude asylum-seekers and other persons subject to immigration control from their registers⁴.

1.18 The housing register scheme did not apply to existing tenants seeking transfers within the same landlord’s stock. As far as those transfers were concerned, local housing authorities retained the broad general discretion to operate any policy they wished, subject to public law considerations of fairness and rationality, and limited statutory requirements to consider housing need¹. Many local housing authorities operated policies of excluding tenants who had a certain level of rent arrears or who were accused of nuisance behaviour from being eligible for a transfer and suspending from transfer schemes those tenants who had refused an offer of a property².

Allocation law between January 2003 and June 2012

1.19 In January 2003, HA 1996, Pt 6 was substantially amended by the Homelessness Act 2002, ss 13–16, which applied in the same way in both England and Wales¹. The concept of a compulsory local housing register was abolished and replaced by a requirement to have a comprehensive local housing allocation scheme. The categories of reasonable preference were altered. New codes of statutory guidance were issued² to which local housing authorities were required to have regard when making allocation schemes and decisions on allocations³. The application of HA 1996, Pt 6 was extended to include existing secure or introductory tenants who had themselves applied for a transfer. Although barely referred to in the statutory amendments made by the Homelessness Act 2002, running through the revised approach to allocation of social housing from 2003 to 2012 was the concept that applicants should have a choice of accommodation, rather than be the subject of a take-it-or-leave-it allocation.

1 In force from 27 January 2003 (Wales) and 31 January 2003 (England).

Allocation law since June 2012

1.20 Since June 2012 the legal position has become significantly more complex. The provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, as amended by the Homelessness Act 2002, remain in force in Wales and continue to operate in essentially the same way as they have done since last significantly amended in 2003. However, in England, the provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, were substantially modified by the Localism Act 2011, ss 145–147, with effect from 18 June 2012. The two key differences are that local housing authorities in England:

1. can now designate classes of applicants who can and cannot qualify for housing allocation under their local allocation schemes; and
2. no longer need to include non-priority transfer applicants in their statutory allocation arrangements.

2 HA 1996, s 160ZA. See 3.91–3.150.

1.21 This legislative dichotomy in the law of social housing allocation as it applies between each of the two countries has been achieved by the insertion of the words ‘in Wales’ into many of the substantive sections of HA 1996, Pt 6, and the insertion into that Part of whole new sections and new subsections containing the words ‘in England’. The law as it presently stands is represented by the amended terms of HA 1996, Pt 6, as set out in Appendix 1 to this edition of this book. The effect of the present arrangements is fully described in Chapters 2–5 of this book.

1 And is also briefly outlined in Dr T Baldwin and J Luba QC, ‘The Localism Act 2011: allocation of social housing accommodation’ (2012) January Legal Action, p 23.

1.22 As before, separate statutory guidance applies in England and in Wales. In England, the current guidance is contained in Allocation of accommodation: guidance for local housing authorities in England which is referred to throughout this part of this book as ‘the English Code’. This expressly replaces all other previous statutory guidance on housing allocation in England. It is to be read with the further guidance issued in December 2013, Providing social housing for local people: Statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local authorities in England, which is referred to throughout this part of this book as ‘the Supplementary English Code’ and with the additional statutory guidance issued in March 2015, Right to move, which is referred to in this part of the book as the ‘RTM Code’6. In Wales, the current guidance is that issued by the Welsh Government which is referred to throughout this book as ‘the Welsh Code’6. In both cases, the guidance has been issued in exercise of the powers granted by HA 1996, s 169. The English Code is reproduced in full in Appendix 1 to this book and on the accompanying CD Rom. The Welsh Code is included on the CD Rom.

WHAT DOES AND DOES NOT COUNT AS AN ‘ALLOCATION’?

1.23 An ‘allocation’ is defined as occurring when a local housing authority selects a person to be its own secure or introductory tenant, nominates a person to be a secure or introductory tenant elsewhere, or nominates a person to be an assured tenant of another social landlord1. The selection or nomination of a person for the initial grant of a ‘flexible’ or ‘affordable’ tenancy of social housing will also be an ‘allocation’ because those tenancies are simply variants of secure or assured tenancies2.

1 HA 1996, s 159(2).
2 English Code, para 1.4.

1.24 The process of allocation is essentially one of identifying a person apt to be made an offer of a social housing tenancy and then the making of that offer. The allocation process does not include the actual entry by the applicant into the tenancy agreement for a particular property. That is a housing management function beyond the scope of HA 1996, Pt 61.

1 ‘Part [6] of the 1996 Act is concerned with, indeed limited to, establishing and then managing priorities between applicants for residential accommodation (which may or may not be owned by the local authority in question) as it becomes available for letting, which effectively is preliminary to, and not part of, the actual letting of such accommodation, which is governed by Pt[2] of the 1985 Act: Birmingham City Council v Qasim [2009] EWCA Civ 1080, [2010] HLR 19, CA per Lord Neuberger MR at [18].
Exceptions

1.25 The allocation provisions set out in HA 1996, Pt 6, do not apply to each and every situation in which a person may come to be a tenant of social housing.

1.26 The Codes each identify the common situations in which social housing can come to be occupied by a new tenant without the statutory provisions on housing allocation engaging at all. Some of these exceptions, outlined in the next few paragraphs, are the result of express provisions in the HA 1996, Pt 6 (and regulations made under them), and others are the result of the term ‘allocation’ in HA 1996 being defined as applying only when a local housing authority nominates or selects a person for a specified type of tenancy. If the tenancy to be granted will not be secure, introductory or assured – for example, because it will be a form of tenancy without security of tenure (such as a ‘family intervention tenancy’) – selection or nomination for that tenancy will not count as an allocation.

What counts as an ‘allocation’? 1.27

The provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, do not apply where someone obtains a tenancy of social housing as a result of:

1. the vesting by succession of a periodic secure or introductory tenancy on the death of the tenant;
2. the devolution of a fixed term secure tenancy on the death of the tenant;
3. the assignment of a secure tenancy as part of a mutual exchange;
4. the assignment of a secure or introductory tenancy to a person who would have been qualified to succeed to the tenancy on the tenant’s death;
5. the vesting or disposal of a secure or introductory tenancy pursuant to a court order made under the specified provisions of three family law statutes identified in HA 1996, Pt 6;
6. an order made under specified provisions of the Civil Partnership Act 2004 in relation to a secure or introductory tenancy;
7. an order made under the Family Law Act 1996, Sch 7, Pt II in relation to a social housing tenancy;
8. a transfer initiated by the landlord of a secure or introductory tenant (ie not initiated by the making of an application for a transfer by the tenant);
9. the local housing authority providing a tenant or owner-occupier who has been displaced from his or her previous accommodation with suitable alternative accommodation under the Land Compensation Act 1973, s 39;
10. the grant of a secure tenancy to a former owner-occupier or statutory tenant of a defective dwelling-house acquired by the local housing authority under Housing Act 1985 ss 554–555;
11. the grant of a tenancy to a person who is currently and lawfully occupying a property held on a family intervention tenancy;
1.27 Allocation of Social Housing: An Overview

(12) in England only, a transfer of a social housing tenant who applied for such a transfer, who was previously a secure, introductory or assured tenant of social housing, and who the local housing authority was satisfied was not in a category qualifying for a ‘reasonable preference’; or

(13) in England only, the tenancy being granted as part of the surrender and re-grant procedure available where two social housing tenants in England wish to exchange their homes and one of the tenants holds a flexible tenancy or an assured shorthold tenancy.

In none of these cases will there have been an ‘allocation’ for HA 1996, Pt 6, purposes.

1 HA 1996, s 160(2)(a) and (3)(b).
2 HA 1996, s 160(2)(b).
3 HA 1996, s 160(2)(c).
4 HA 1996, s 160(2)(d) and (3)(c).
5 HA 1996, s 160(2)(e)(i)–(iii) and (3)(d)(i)–(iii).
6 HA 1996, s 160(2)(e)(iv) and (3)(d)(iv).
7 An order under those provisions moves the tenancy from the existing tenant to a new tenant by ‘virtue of the order and without further assurance’ (FLA 1996, Sch 2, para 7(1)) and therefore there is no intervention by the local housing authority and no allocation for HA 1996, Pt 6 purposes.
8 HA 1996, s 159(4B)(b) (England) and s 159(5) (Wales).
11 HA 1996, s 159(4A) and (4B)(c) (England).

Allocation to current non-tenant occupiers

1.28 Local housing authorities receive many requests for tenancy allocation from non-tenants who are occupying existing local housing authority accommodation and are seeking the grant of a tenancy for that particular property. Such an occupier may have no statutory right to the tenancy, but may have been occupying that accommodation as his or her home for some time and wish to remain there. Examples would include:

• where one joint tenant has terminated the tenancy, by serving a notice to quit on the landlord, and the other former joint tenant remains in the home; or

• where a tenant has died and the remaining household member has no statutory succession rights but had lived with the tenant for some time, or was the tenant’s carer or former partner, or needs to live in the property to care for the tenant’s dependants; or

• where a tenant has moved to a care home, and the remaining household member has no right to an assignment of the tenancy but had lived with the tenant for some time.

Regulation of social housing providers 1.32

1.29 An allocation of a new tenancy in those situations will be subject to HA 1996, Pt 6, and will ultimately be governed by the terms of the local housing authority’s allocation scheme. The Welsh Code recommends that local housing authorities set out in their allocation schemes whether they will grant tenancies in these circumstances and, if so, on what basis. If the local housing authority does include provisions for these classes of case within its allocation scheme then, when deciding whether to evict the non-tenant who is in occupation, it should consider whether to:

1. give the non-tenant advice and/or information about the relevant provisions of its scheme; and
2. encourage an application from a person who might be within such a class.¹

Where the property is owned by a private registered provider or registered social landlord, in a case such as one of these, the arrangements described in Chapter 6 will apply.

REGULATION OF SOCIAL HOUSING PROVIDERS

1.30 Matters relating to housing allocation schemes are subject to regulation by the national regulatory authorities.

England

1.31 In England, the body responsible for regulation of social housing is the Regulation Committee. This is a statutory committee of the Homes and Communities Agency,² which was established by the Housing and Regeneration Act 2008 (HRA 2008).³ It has the power to set standards to be followed by registered providers of social housing⁴. The Secretary of State may direct the regulator to issue such standards⁴.

¹ On 11 January 2018 the Homes and Communities Agency’s investment arm adopted the trading name of Homes England whilst the regulation directorate re-named itself the Regulator of Social Housing. At the time of writing, a draft Statutory Instrument was before Parliament (the Legislative Reform (Regulator of Social Housing) Order 2018) which if made will abolish the Regulation Committee of the Homes and Communities Agency, create a Regulator of Social Housing, and transfer the functions of the Regulation Committee to the Regulator of Social Housing. The way in which registered providers of social housing are regulated is not expected to change.

⁴ HRA 2008, s 197(1). The current directions are set out at Annex A of Implementing Social Housing reform: Directions to the Social Housing Regulator – Consultation: a summary of responses (DCLG, November 2011).

1.32 A provider of social housing is defined, in respect of low cost rented accommodation, as the landlord of such accommodation⁵. This includes both
1.32 Allocation of Social Housing: An Overview

Local housing authorities 2 – where they have not disposed of all their stock – and other social landlords such as housing associations. The regulator must maintain a register of providers of social housing which must be available for inspection by the public 3.

1.33 The standards set by the Regulation Committee require registered providers of social housing to comply with specified rules about criteria for allocating housing accommodation 1. The current regulatory standards are contained in The Regulatory framework for social housing in England from April 2015 2.

1.34 In England, the current regulatory standard for housing allocation in England (part of a broader Tenancy Standard) provides:

‘1 Allocations and mutual exchange

1.1 Registered providers shall let their homes in a fair, transparent and efficient way. They shall take into account the housing needs and aspirations of tenants and potential tenants. They shall demonstrate how their lettings:

• make the best use of available housing

• are compatible with the purpose of the housing

• contribute to local authorities’ strategic housing function and sustainable communities

There should be clear application, decision-making and appeals processes.’

1.35 The regulatory standard then sets out the following Specific Expectations 3:

1.1 Registered providers shall co-operate with local authorities’ strategic housing function, and their duties to meet identified local housing needs. This includes assistance with local authorities’ homelessness duties, and through meeting obligations in nominations agreements.

1.2 Registered providers shall develop and deliver services to address under-occupation and overcrowding in their homes, within the resources available to them. These services should be focused on the needs of their tenants, and will offer choices to them.

1.3 Registered providers’ published policies shall include how they have made use of common housing registers, common allocations policies and local letting policies. Registered providers shall clearly set out, and be able to give reasons for, the criteria they use for excluding actual and potential tenants from consideration for allocations, mobility or mutual exchange schemes.

1.4 Registered providers shall develop and deliver allocations processes in a way which supports their effective use by the full range of actual and potential tenants, including those with support needs, those who do not speak English as a first language and others who have difficulties with written English.

1.5 Registered providers shall minimise the time that properties are empty between each letting. When doing this, they shall take into account the circumstances of the tenants who have been offered the properties.

1.6 Registered providers shall record all lettings and sales as required by the Continuous Recording of Lettings (CORE) system.

1.7 Registered providers shall provide tenants wishing to move with access to clear and relevant advice about their housing options.

The Housing and Regeneration Act 2008 (HRA 2008) gives the regulator considerable powers of inspection and enforcement to ensure that these standards are complied with.¹

Wales

1.36 In Wales, the regulatory function falls to the Welsh Ministers. A Housing Regulation Team undertakes the regulation activity on their behalf and its work is overseen by the Regulatory Board for Wales. Under HA 1996, s 33A the Welsh Ministers may set performance standards to be met by registered social landlords in connection with their functions relating to the provision of housing. The Welsh Ministers may issue guidance relating to and amplifying a performance standard under HA 1996, s 33B.

1.37 In contrast to England, these regulatory standards apply only to housing associations and other non-profit-making housing bodies¹. It does not apply to local housing authorities.

1.38 The current performance standards and guidance are contained within The Regulatory Framework for Housing Associations Registered in Wales¹. This has the stated purpose of improving and strengthening the Welsh Government’s approach to regulation but the guidance it provides in respect of allocations is minimal. Performance Standard 5 requires housing associations to demonstrate ‘A track record of achieving positive outcomes, responding appropriately to new challenges and performance issues’. The guidance accompanying this standard recommends that the association demonstrate ‘how lettings make the best use of available housing, compatible with the core purpose of the Registered Social Landlord’.

1.39 Allocation of Social Housing: An Overview

1.39 More general guidance is available in the introduction to the Framework, which confirms that:

‘Key elements of the risk based approach of the 2011 Framework remain unchanged
• Tenants remain at the heart of regulation with improved accountability and transparency to tenants and other stakeholders
• The underpinning principles of proportionality, transparency and openness, consistency and promotion of learning and development, are unchanged
• The approach to regulation continues to be founded on co-regulation.

HOW ARE THE MODERN ALLOCATION SCHEMES OPERATING?

England

1.40 Despite the major legislative changes relating to social housing allocation brought into force in England in 1997, 2003 and 2012 respectively, there has been no recent major national research programme to investigate or monitor the lawfulness or effectiveness of the housing allocation schemes subsequently adopted and operated by the hundreds of local housing authorities across England.

1.41 In 2004–05 an independent survey was conducted of the allocation schemes operated by 12 local housing authorities in the London area1. Its conclusions were that:

• local housing authorities were not disclosing all aspects of their allocation procedures in their published allocation schemes as required by HA 1996, Pt 62;
• requests for copies of allocation schemes were not being met promptly by many local housing authorities and in some cases copies of allocation schemes were only available under threat of litigation;
• there was an urgent need for DCLG to provide further guidance to ensure that local housing authorities comply with their statutory duties; and
• to ensure that social housing is allocated in a fair and transparent manner, targets must be set and outcomes monitored and published3.

2 HA 1996, s 167(1).

1.42 In 2007–08, the Department for Communities and Local Government commissioned a small scale review by other independent researchers. Its findings presented only a snapshot of practice across a relatively modest selection of local housing authorities1.

1 Exploring local authority policy and practice on housing allocations (DCLG, July 2009).

1.43 In 2016 the Local Government Ombudsman1 published a special focus report about complaints it had received regarding housing allocation2. It noted that in the year 2014–15 it had received 978 complaints and enquiries about housing allocation, a 13% increase on the previous year. Where a detailed investigation had been carried out, fault had been found in 42% of cases. Some of the main areas of fault were:

- delay in dealing with cases;
- decisions which were not in accordance with the local housing authority’s allocation scheme;
- failure to take into account relevant information;
- failure to notify an applicant of their right of review; and
- removing an application from the register or reducing an applicant’s priority without properly considering his or her circumstances.

1.44 These limited reports do demonstrate that, despite the wholesale restructuring of housing allocation law made by the successive amendments to HA 1996, Pt 6, too many local housing authorities have taken too long to catch up with changes in the modern law of social housing allocation and to devise and implement wholly lawful housing allocation schemes. In England it has been left to inspectors, the courts and the Ombudsmen to turn up instances of poor or unlawful practices which may, in fact, be widespread. For example, an Audit Commission inspection of one major English city council’s allocation arrangements found:

> ‘the allocation policy and practice . . . is poor and lacks clarity, clear policies and procedures and there is no effective mechanism of control or audit to ensure the allocation of homes is done fairly and transparently.’

1 1.46 How are the modern allocation schemes operating? 1.46

Wales

1.46 In Wales, the much smaller number of local housing authorities, which were operating from 1997 to 2012 under essentially the same legal framework as those in England, have been subject to significant scrutiny and that scrutiny has thrown up issues equally relevant to social housing allocation by local housing authorities in England. For example, in February 2006, the Public Services Ombudsman for Wales published a special report containing an examination of how the modern legal structure for social housing allocation was operating in Wales. The report found that:
1.46 Allocation of Social Housing: An Overview

- a significant number of Welsh local housing authorities had yet to adopt allocation policies that fully complied with the law and took account of the statutory guidance;
- in particular, the changes introduced by the Homelessness Act 2002 had still not been sufficiently implemented, some three years after those changes had come into force;
- as a result, the lawfulness of each allocation decision since January 2003 was potentially questionable;
- some local housing authorities continued to operate unlawful policies of blanket exclusions; and
- some local housing authorities were failing to accord preference to the categories of applicants entitled to a reasonable preference.

3 See 4.27–4.112.

1.47 Local housing authorities in Wales were asked to take expert legal advice and to review their allocation schemes as a matter of urgency. Some Welsh local housing authorities had already started that process as a result of the Public Services Ombudsman’s investigations of individual complaints.

1.48 In response to the Ombudsman’s Special Report, and to further letters of complaint being received by the Welsh Assembly Government and by Shelter, officials of the Welsh Assembly Government carried out a joint review with Shelter Cymru of the 22 local housing authority allocation schemes in Wales. That review was published in March 2007. It found that all the allocation schemes scrutinised required some level of further review. Issues identified ranged from failure to adopt schemes meeting statutory requirements to the need to clarify or elaborate those schemes which did satisfy the legal basics. The report contained a series of recommendations for both the Welsh Assembly Government and for local housing authorities. The latter included a recommendation that every Welsh local housing authority ‘undertake a fundamental review of their allocation schemes to ensure they are compliant with the law, Code of Guidance and good practice and review them annually thereafter’.

1.49 The response of the Welsh Assembly Government was to commit itself to ‘undertaking a full review of allocation schemes every three years, to issue strengthened guidance to local housing authorities and housing associations on allocations’, and to ensuring that the ‘revised guidance addresses the issues raised by the Ombudsman’. While the content of that revised guidance was being formulated, the Chartered Institute for Housing in Wales reported that, at least in respect of the operation of provisions excluding applicants from social housing, ‘not all the exclusion policies and procedures examined during the project were legal’.

The future for social housing allocation 1.53

In April 2010, in its new National Housing Strategy for Wales, the Welsh Assembly Government identified as a priority the need to ‘extend the legal powers available to the National Assembly for Wales so that it is able to do more to help meet housing need’[1]. That bore fruit in an order made in July 2010 by which the Assembly acquired jurisdiction to make legislation relating to ‘the arrangements under which social housing is provided’[2]. However, the power given has yet to be significantly exercised by the Assembly in respect of social housing allocation notwithstanding the adoption of a significant legislative programme in relation to housing matters[3]. The subsequent H(W)A 2014 has re-cast the law on homelessness in Wales, but its impact on social housing allocation is confined to minor consequential amendments.

1.52 Whilst there is no statutory obligation to keep allocation schemes under review, many local housing authorities do so as a matter of good practice. A survey of local housing authorities and social landlords conducted by the Chartered Institute of Housing in October 2013 found that most respondents have either carried out a review of their allocations scheme in the last 12 months (60%) or plan a review in the next 12 months (29%)[1].

1.53 Particular events may lead to the amendment of local housing authorities’ allocation schemes. In England, the expectation was that – starting from no later than December 2013[1] – every local housing authority would reconsider the terms of its housing allocation scheme in the light of the amendments made to HA 1996, Pt 6, by the Localism Act 2011 which came into force in June 2012. In the foreword to the current English Code, the then Housing Minister explained that the intention was ‘to assist councils to make full use of these new freedoms – and the existing flexibilities within the allocation legislation – to encourage work and mobility, and to tailor their allocation

1.54 In Wales, the publication of the revised Welsh Code in March 2016 may well trigger a review of local housing authority allocation schemes across that country\(^1\).

\(^1\) See Welsh Code, para 1.46 explains changes made since the last code was issued in April 2015.

1.55 In the special focus report published in 2016, the Local Government Ombudsman stated that it would ‘criticise a local housing authority for failing to review its housing allocation scheme in response to a court judgement [sic] against a different authority that raises an issue which is clearly relevant to the authority’s own scheme\(^2\). As discussed in Chapter 4, there have been several important decisions recently which are likely to have implications for most or all local housing authorities. Three particular issues that have come before the courts repeatedly are:

- The requirement to avoid discrimination in allocation schemes\(^3\);
- The obligation to give a reasonable preference in the allocation scheme to certain groups of people\(^4\); and
- Ensuring that the best interests of children are treated as a primary consideration in the formulation and amendment of allocation schemes\(^5\).

Local housing authorities are likely to want to review their allocation schemes carefully in light of the recent decisions on these questions.

INTRODUCTION

2.1 Access to straightforward information about how the local housing allocations scheme operates is crucial to applicants having confidence in the process. Consequently, in the Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996), Pt 6 (‘Allocation of Housing Accommodation’), there are specific obligations on local housing authorities to inform members of the public about the content of their allocation schemes, and to provide applicants with advice and information about their individual applications. In addition, local housing authorities are subject to the provisions of the General Data Protection Regulation 2016, the Data Protection Act 2018, and the Freedom of Information Act 2000, which may respectively enable applicants to access records relating to their own applications and obtain information about specific aspects of housing alloca-
2.1 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation

2.2 HA 1996, Pt 6, also makes reasonably detailed provision about what local housing allocation schemes must contain in relation to the receipt and processing of applications, and the notification of decisions. Those provisions are supplemented by statutory guidance.

2.3 Some applicants will, inevitably, be dissatisfied with decisions affecting their applications. In some, but not all, of those cases, HA 1996, Pt 6, gives applicants the right to request a review of those decisions or requires that such a right be provided under the terms of a local allocation scheme. An applicant dissatisfied with the result of a review could bring judicial review proceedings to challenge the decision on review or the process by which it was reached. There is no provision within HA 1996, Pt 6, for an appeal to the county court. For those cases in which reviews are not specifically provided for in HA 1996, Pt 6, the local housing authority may provide an extra-statutory review. In any event, legal challenge to an initial decision, a statutory review decision, or an extra-statutory review decision can only be by way of judicial review.

2.4 Additionally, a complaint about the handling of an individual application can be made via the local housing authority’s internal complaints procedure, or be raised with its monitoring officer or, ultimately, be pursued with the Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman (LGSCO) in respect of local housing authorities in England or the Public Services Ombudsman (PSO) for Wales. An applicant who is or has become a tenant of social housing could also complain to the statutory regulator of social housing. In England, that is presently the Regulation Committee of the Homes and Communities Agency. In Wales, the ‘regulators’ are the Welsh Government and the Welsh Ministers. The complainant can seek redress if it appears that the local housing authority has not complied with the relevant regulator’s published national standards (described in Chapters 1 and 6).

2.5 This chapter reviews, in sequence, the statutory duties upon local housing authorities to provide information for applicants, to receive and process applications, and to notify decisions on those applications. Readers concerned with applications being made directly to housing associations and other private registered providers or registered social landlords will find assistance in Chapter 6.
INFORMATION

General information and advice about local social housing allocation

2.6 HA 1996, Pt 6, requires local housing authorities to ensure that advice and information about the right to apply for social housing accommodation is available free of charge to everyone in their districts. Although HA 1996, Pt 6, elsewhere specifically requires the publication of a free summary of the allocation scheme, this general duty to make information and advice available goes much wider than that.

2 HA 1996, s 168(1).

2.7 The information provided by local housing authorities should include information about housing allocation procedures and also potential stock availability. Statutory guidance advises that information should also be available about qualification and prioritisation criteria.

1 English Code, para 5.4, Welsh Code, para 3.15.

2.8 Local housing authorities may also wish to provide general information about the profile of their stock, including the type, size and location of the housing, whether it is accessible or could be adapted, whether there is access to a shared or private garden, and how old it is. Where stock is in short supply, an indication of how frequently it is likely to become available would also be helpful.

2.9 The Chartered Institute of Housing (CIH) has identified that:

‘the publication of accessible and free information is vital in enabling people to take responsibility for their own housing solutions. This should additionally include information about housing options that exist within a local area. Where local authorities have stock or have nomination rights to partners’ stock, it is important how that stock will be used and who is eligible for help is clear to everyone. This will be particularly important in the light of the local variations and additions that government is proposing to allow local authorities to introduce. The variety of local differences mean that clarity of local conditions and eligibility will be even more important to help people navigate local circumstances and make effective and empowered choices for themselves.’

2.10 Care must be taken to ensure that this advice and information is accessible to all. The Welsh Code advises that information should be easy to understand and that it should be available on request in translation, in alternative formats (Braille, large print, and audiotapes, etc), and through a variety of media, including printed hard copy, online, and via the telephone. The former Commission for Racial Equality’s Code of Practice on Racial Equality in Housing includes this pertinent example of the care that needs to be taken in preparing information:

‘A local council (or housing association) fails to make sure that information about its lettings services reaches people from all racial groups; for example, by not advertising the service in outlets which it knows are preferred by ethnic minority residents. This could amount to indirect discrimination’ (Example 35).

1 Welsh Code, paras 1.25–1.29 and 3.49.
2 See 4.227.

2.11 Prospective applicants may also have the right to obtain a broader range of information about social housing allocation under the General Data Protection Regulation 2016, the Data Protection Act 2018 and the Freedom of Information Act 2000.

1 English Code, para 5.7 and see 2.28–2.29.

2.12 For some enquirers, the provision of information will suffice. But the statutory duty under HA 1996, s 166(1)(a), also requires that advice must be available free of charge. This can be particularly important where the local housing authority has adopted a choice-based letting scheme that requires applicants to be proactive in securing an allocation. Suitable advice could be provided by the local housing authority itself, a social landlord, or the voluntary sector, and is likely to be most effective if the adviser has appropriate housing-related experience and is properly trained to sensitively meet the needs of a diverse client group.

Information about a particular local allocation scheme

2.13 Each local housing authority is required by HA 1996, Pt 6, to publish a summary of its allocation scheme and to make a copy of that summary available free of charge to ‘any member of the public who asks for one’. The request for a copy can come from ‘any member of the public’. There is no requirement that the person making the request should also be an applicant under the local housing authority’s allocation scheme, or even a prospective applicant. Indeed, there is no requirement that the person should have any connection with that particular local housing authority’s district. Any member of the public, anywhere in the country, is entitled to receive a free summary of any local housing authority’s allocation scheme on request. Obviously, it is this provision that allows advisers to collect summaries of any allocation schemes that might be useful to them in advising members of the public.

1 HA 1996, s 168(1).

2.14 There is no requirement to publish the whole of the allocation scheme, although many local housing authorities do put their full scheme on their website’ and in Wales the expectation is that all local housing authorities will do so. However, each local housing authority must ‘make the scheme available for inspection at their principal office’. The principal office is usually the town hall, or the central address for the housing department. Members of the public do not, however, need to attend the principal office, in person, in order to see the full scheme. If they ask for a copy (in person, by post, by phone, or by email), and pay any required fee (which can only be a reasonable amount), the local housing authority ‘shall provide’ a copy of the full scheme.
Again, advisers may consider purchasing copies of the allocation schemes operated by the local housing authorities which deal with the majority of their clients, or may simply download copies from websites.

1 Local housing authority websites are usually at the government’s domain name: thus, a typical address would be www.anytown.gov.uk. In preparing the report Exploring local authority policy and practice on housing allocations (CLG, July 2009) researchers found that only 71% of local housing authorities surveyed had published the full scheme on their websites. Even among those operating choice-based letting schemes, 15% had not done so.

2 Welsh Code, paras 3.15 and 3.49.

3 HA 1996, s 168(2).

2.15 Sadly, not all local housing authorities readily embraced the statutory requirement to make the full scheme available for purchase on demand. The full scheme, which must cover ‘all aspects of the allocation process’¹, will often be a substantial document and there is not infrequently a degree of reticence in supplying copies. In 2004/2005 one limited exercise in requesting copy schemes from 12 local housing authorities in London produced only four responses within 14 days, five further responses within 28 days, and the remaining three only after complaints to the monitoring officer for each local housing authority and service of a pre-action protocol letter threatening judicial review proceedings². A good deal of time and legal expense can be wasted when a failure to respond promptly to a request for a copy of the scheme leads to a claim for a mandatory order in judicial review proceedings³. Such claims will almost never come to trial, for obvious reasons, but will leave local housing authorities with substantial legal costs easily exceeding the expense of supplying a copy of the scheme promptly in response to the initial request.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(1) (England), s 167(1) (Wales).

Information about applications

2.16 When a person applies for an allocation of social housing, he or she must be informed by the local housing authority of his or her relevant statutory rights, or the local housing authority must secure that someone else informs the applicant of those rights¹. The relevant rights are:

- the right to request such general information as will enable the applicant to assess how his or her application is likely to be treated under the scheme, including whether he or she is likely to fall within any of the groups entitled to a reasonable preference²;
- the right to request such general information as will enable him or her to assess whether accommodation appropriate to his or her needs is likely to be made available and, if so, how long it is likely to be before an offer is made³;

Information 2.16
2.16 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation

- the right (if the application is made to a local housing authority in Wales) to be notified in writing of any decision that he or she is not to be given any reasonable preference that he or she would ordinarily have been entitled to receive, and of the reasons for that decision²;
- the right to ask the local housing authority to inform him or her of any decision about the facts of his or her case which has been, or is likely to be, taken into account when considering whether to allocate accommodation³;
- the right to request a review of any decision that he or she is not to be given reasonable preference, any decision as to the facts of his or her case, any decision that he or she is not eligible for an allocation, or (if the application is made to a local housing authority in England) any decision that he or she is not a qualifying person for an allocation⁶; and
- the right to be informed of a review decision and the grounds for that review decision⁷.

1 HA 1996, s 166A (England) and s 166(2) (Wales). The Welsh Code suggests that this duty should be implemented within the context of ‘a constructive housing options approach, so that applicants will understand their prospects of being rehoused into the accommodation they are seeking’: Welsh Code, para 3.205.
4 HA 1996, s 167(4A)(b) (Wales only).
5 HA 1996, s 166A(9)(b) (England), s 167(4A)(c) (Wales).
6 HA 1996, s 166A(9)(c) (England), s 167(4A)(d) (Wales).
7 HA 1996, s 166A(9)(c) (England), s 167(4A)(d) (Wales).

2.17 Such information must be given to every applicant and, plainly, the terms of the statutory provision indicate a policy intention that the information should be provided when the application is first received, in a written acknowledgement of, or response to, the application or as accompanying information to the acknowledgement or response.

2.18 As is clear from the first two items in the list above, the applicant may request ‘general information’ which will enable him or her to assess how the application is likely to be treated, whether he or she will be entitled to any preference, whether he or she is likely to receive accommodation and, if so, after what period. There is no time limit specified within which this information must be requested. It follows, therefore, that the applicant may request this information at any time, once he or she has made the application. Of all the available information, it is this – a realistic appraisal of the prospects of obtaining a suitable local allocation – that the applicant is most likely to want. Many advisers will have drawn up pro-forma requests for this information, to enclose when writing to a local housing authority about individual applications.

2.19 The statutory Codes of Guidance on social housing allocation do not contain much guidance on what sort of information the applicant could expect to receive, having made his or her request. Local housing authorities might usefully maintain lists of properties earmarked for special groups (eg properties adapted for disabled use, etc), and make those lists available to relevant applicants. However, only a small number of applicants will benefit from that.

\section*{Information 2.23}

\subsection*{2.20} For most applicants, the information that they receive in response to such a request should include:

- whether or not they have been accepted as eligible for an allocation;
- whether or not (in England) they qualify for an allocation;
- the type of property they are likely to be allocated;
- the method that will be used in assessing their needs, whether by awarding points or by inclusion in a specific group or band, or otherwise;
- the number of other applicants with equal or greater priority; and
- an assessment of the likely time that they will have to wait to receive an offer (or to make a successful bid in a choice-based letting scheme), by reference to average waiting time or to the number of lettings of similar properties in the previous year or quarter.

\subsection*{2.21} This sort of information allows the applicant an opportunity to assess his or her realistic (if sometimes depressing) chances of receiving an offer. It may usefully be accompanied by a copy of the free published summary of the particular local housing authority’s allocation scheme. In short, the thrust of the statutory provisions is that the local allocations process, and information about it, should be transparent and open:

‘we want a really open and transparent allocation scheme so that anybody can see what a particular council’s scheme is, and can understand why they have been included or excluded and whether it is appropriate for them to appeal\textsuperscript{1}.’

\textsuperscript{1} Andrew Stunnell MP, Under-Secretary of State, House of Commons Public Bill Committee on the Localism Bill, 3 March 2011, col 765.

\subsection*{2.22} These aspects, dealing with the provision of information, make it unnecessary for applicants to rely on the general rights to provision of information by a local housing authority set out in Housing Act 1985, s 106. That section was specifically amended by the Homelessness Act 2002 to disapply its provisions so far as they impose requirements corresponding to those to which a local housing authority is now subject under HA 1996, s 168\textsuperscript{1}.

\subsection*{2.23} Of course, in order to be able to measure the information that he or she has received against what actually happens in practice - in terms of the distribution of housing under a local housing authority’s allocation scheme – an applicant will need access to information about the outcomes applicants generally achieve under the local scheme. Indeed, one function of the current statutory guidance in England is ‘to encourage authorities to be open and transparent about who is applying for and being allocated social housing in their area\textsuperscript{1}’. That guidance specifically advises that:

‘It is important that applicants and the wider community understand how social housing is allocated in their area, and that they know who is getting that social housing, so that they can see that the allocation system is fair and the authority is complying with its allocation scheme. We would encourage housing authorities to consider how accurate and anonymised information on waiting list applicants and lettings outcomes could be routinely published, to strengthen public confidence in the fairness of their allocation scheme.

1 Providing social housing for local people (DCLG, December 2013) (the Supplementary English Code), para 10.
2 The Supplementary English Code, para 28.

2.24 However, it does not follow from the duty to publish the scheme, or to provide either person-specific or more general information about likely or actual outcomes, that:

'an applicant is entitled to be able to predict when and if he will actually be accorded accommodation. There are many uncertainties, thus, for instance, the Authority cannot know for certain which of its properties will become vacant or what size they will be. Some people who were on the list may leave the area or, for other reasons, no longer be eligible to bid. Other people may move into the area or join one of the categories to whom reasonable preference must be given. The two Codes of Guidance specifically contemplate that an Authority may use quotas and confine bidding for specific properties to particular groups on its list. I recognize . . . that this will mean that the operation of the Scheme is not as transparent as it might otherwise be . . . '.

2.25 On an application for permission to appeal in that particular case, Lord Justice Sullivan said:

'The mere proposition that [an allocation scheme] might be more transparent is not sufficient to establish unlawfulness. To a degree there is bound to be a trade off between simplicity and the complexity inherent in any scheme that tries to monitor and adjust to ensure that particular targets are being met. What precisely results from that trade off is very much a matter for the judgment of the local authority: the more sensitive the scheme, it may well be the more complex it will be, and therefore it can be said that the less transparent it will be, but it seems to me that it could not be said that this scheme is so opaque as to be unlawful.'

Information about specific facts

2.26 The applicant has the right to ask the local housing authority to inform him or her of any decision about the facts of his or her case which is likely to be, or have been, taken into account in considering whether to allocate housing accommodation to him or her. This right is supplemented by the right of every applicant to have made available, on request, at all reasonable times and without charge, details of the particulars which he or she has given to the authority about himself or herself and about his or her family and which the authority has recorded as being relevant to the application for accommodation. These rights to information are only triggered if the applicant requests the information; there is no automatic requirement on the local housing authority to give this information to the applicant as a matter of course. The right first mentioned above is a right to be informed of any decision taken "about the facts of his [or her] case". The 'facts' relied upon by the local housing authority in reaching its decision may have come from various sources: from the applicant, but also from housing officers, doctors, schools, other professionals or agencies, or even neighbours.

2.27 The right to be informed about decisions made on factual issues is not limited to the facts which the local housing authority takes into account in determining general issues about whether to allocate accommodation to the applicant, for example, as to his or her eligibility or priority. The wording is sufficiently broad to enable an applicant to ask to be informed about any decisions, for example, about decisions as to whether he or she will be considered for, or why he or she was not considered for, a particular property.

2.28 Local housing authorities are also subject to the information disclosure requirements of the General Data Protection Regulation 2017 and the Data Protection Act 2018, giving any individual the right to obtain confirmation as to whether or not 'personal data' concerning him or her is being processed and, if so, access to that personal data. The individual also has the right to be told the purposes of the processing, what categories of personal data are involved, to whom the personal data has been or will be disclosed, for how long the personal data will be stored, his or her right to request rectification or erasure of the personal data or to lodge a complaint, from where the personal data has been collected if not the individual, and information in respect of any automated decision-making that is occurring. ‘Personal data’ means any data relating to a natural person who is identified or can be identified directly or indirectly, including by reference to an identification number. A request may be made verbally or in writing. The local housing authority must comply with the request without undue delay and at the latest within one month. The information must be provided free of charge, except where the request is manifestly unfounded or excessive, in which case the local housing authority may charge a reasonable fee or refuse the request. The advice given in the English Code in respect of the Data Protection Act 1998, namely that if local housing authorities remain unclear about their obligations and responsibilities in the context of social housing allocation they may wish to contact the office of the Information Commissioner, remains valid.

6 English Code, para 5.7. The website of the Information Commissioner is at https://ico.org.uk. See generally Findings from ICO advisory visits to social housing organisations (Information Commissioner’s Office, February 2014).

2.29 Local housing authorities are also subject to the information disclosure provisions of the Freedom of Information Act 2000. An individual is entitled to make a written request to a public authority, which includes a local housing authority, and to be informed by the public authority whether it holds information of the description specified in the request and, if so, to have that information communicated to the individual, unless the information is exempt. ‘Personal data’ is exempt from disclosure, as it is provided to the public authority in confidence. The Freedom of Information Act 2000 can therefore be used to obtain the local housing authority’s policies, procedures and other general information about social housing allocation, but not confidential information about a particular application. The duties imposed by the Freedom of Information Act 2000 are additional to the duties imposed by HA 1996, Pt 6, to provide information. For example, an applicant may use a request under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 to obtain a list of local housing authority properties in a particular area or throughout a local housing authority’s district in order to know what properties might become available. However, where a local housing authority was asked to give the addresses of properties owned by a private registered provider operating in its area it was entitled to provide that information in a way that did not allow individual occupiers to be identified.

1 Freedom of Information Act 2000, s 1; exemptions are at ss 21–44 inclusive.
2 Freedom of Information Act 2000, s 40.
3 See, for example, W v West Lothian Council, Decision 074/2015, 3 June 2015, Scottish Information Commissioner.

Confidentiality

2.30 The applicant has the personal right to confidentiality, in that the fact that an application has been made cannot be divulged to any other member of the public without the applicant’s consent. Routinely, of course, local housing authorities request consent from applicants so that they can seek information from others, such as doctors or social workers, to help them determine an application for social housing. This consent should not, however, be treated as a general consent permitting the local housing authority to inform others, who do not need to know, that an application has been made. In practice, a considerable issue has arisen about the sharing of information between local housing authorities and private registered providers or registered social landlords about applicants nominated to such landlords for housing allocation. Local housing authorities could usefully draw up information sharing protocols to cover such situations, but any sharing of personal information about an applicant can only be achieved by consent of the applicant and only in compliance with the General Data Protection Regulation 2016. To facilitate the drawing up of information-sharing protocols, the former Housing Corporation published a national standard protocol on sharing information about applicants for re-housing².

APPLICATIONS

Making an application

2.31 Local housing authorities are under no duty to seek out those most in need of any available social housing. Their statutory responsibilities are confined to responding to, and considering, applications made to them by those seeking allocation of any available stock. So, for all those seeking social housing, everything turns on successfully making an application and then pursuing its proper consideration under the terms of the allocation scheme adopted by the local housing authority to which the application is made.

2.32 However, to ensure that the most vulnerable are not disadvantaged in gaining access to what might be available, each local housing authority must ensure that free advice and information is available in its district about the right to make an application for social housing¹. Each local housing authority must also ensure that free assistance is provided to anyone who is likely to have difficulty in making an application².

2.33 Many of those most in need of social housing will have sought the help of the local housing authority because they were homeless or facing the prospect of homelessness. An application for homelessness assistance (made under HA 1996, Pt 7 ‘Homelessness: England’ or Housing (Wales) Act 2014, Pt 2 ‘Homelessness’) does not automatically count as an application for an allocation of social housing (under HA 1996, Pt 6), and therefore local housing authorities receiving applications for homelessness assistance should ensure that applicants also complete any separate application forms required for their allocation schemes¹.

¹ The Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities (MHCLG, February 2018) (the English Homelessness Code) para 3.7, suggests that ‘many people concerned about a risk of homelessness will be seeking practical advice and assistance’ and that advice on a number of issues, including ‘how to apply for social housing’ may help to prevent people from becoming threatened with homelessness. In one case, a delay of six months between a young applicant approaching a local housing authority for homelessness assistance and him being helped to complete a social housing allocation application compounded a catalogue of maladministration: Complaint against Dover City Council, 09 017 510, 31 July 2012, Local Government Ombudsman, (2012) October Legal Action, p 36.

2.34 Although HA 1996, Pt 6, does not explicitly say so in terms, everyone has a right to make an application to any, or indeed every, local housing authority, although they may not necessarily qualify or be eligible for an allocation by that authority¹. Applications cannot be restricted or rejected simply because the local housing authority to which the application has been made has little or no vacant housing currently available. The chosen local housing authority may not even own any property to rent, perhaps having disposed of its housing stock, but it must still receive and process applications under its allocation scheme and then ‘allocate’ by making nominations to local private registered providers or registered social landlords, or to other local housing authorities, under that scheme.\(^1\)

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 166(1), which deals with the provision of information, refers to ‘the right to make an application’ and the English Code, para 5.4, uses the term ‘right to apply for an allocation’.

2.35 There is no minimum age restriction on applications and nothing in the statutory scheme suggests that a person who is ‘dependent’ on another cannot apply.\(^1\)

\(^1\) In contrast to an application for homelessness assistance: see 8.40–8.46. See also R v Oldham Metropolitan Borough Council ex p Garlick [1993] AC 509, HL.

2.36 There is no statutorily prescribed form for the making of an application. The only requirement, in order to have an application considered, is that the application must be made in accordance with the procedural requirements (if any) set out in the allocation scheme of the local housing authority to which the application is directed.\(^1\) If the scheme requires that a particular application form should be completed, the form should ideally be straightforward to complete but might well also be sufficiently detailed to enable a wide range of information to be obtained from the applicant (e.g. as to age, religion, sexual orientation, ethnicity, disability, gender, any support needs, immigration status, and composition of the household). The Welsh Code suggests that the forms should be accompanied by guidance notes which are themselves easy to understand and ‘in plain language’\(^2\).

2.37 Separate applications must be made to each local housing authority from which the applicant seeks consideration for an allocation. To make the process easier for applicants, local housing authorities and private registered providers or registered social landlords which are collaborating in regional or sub-regional allocation arrangements might usefully have a single application form that can be treated as constituting an application to them all.\(^1\)

\(^1\) See 6.53–6.59.

2.38 There are no statutory pre-conditions to the making of an application. The local housing authority cannot impose a charge for receiving an application or for its consideration. Even if the local housing authority believes that the applicant is highly likely to be found to be ineligible for an allocation or (in England) not to qualify, or is likely to be given a very low priority under the local scheme, it must still accept an application from anyone, whether that person is physically in its district or elsewhere, if the application is made in accordance with the relevant procedural requirements (if any) of the local housing authority’s scheme (although see 2.73–2.74 in respect of repeat applications).\(^1\) It is important to emphasise that every application culminates in a written decision. No applicant should be prevented or dissuaded from making an application even if it may be determined, in due course, that he or she is not eligible or (in England) is not within a qualifying class.

1 HA 1996, s 166(3). For an example of allocations arrangements which unlawfully prevented applicants from submitting an application, see Complaint against Bristol City Council, 16 003 575, 3 April 2018, Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman, (2018) June Legal Action, p 34.

2.39 Again, so as to ensure that the most vulnerable are not excluded, local housing authorities are advised to ensure that applicants who have no fixed address can make applications.

1 Welsh Code, para 2.71.

2.40 Some local housing authorities require applicants to ‘renew’ their applications (essentially by re-applying) at regular intervals. This can work to the disadvantage of those applicants with unsettled accommodation, who are in consequence highly mobile, or those applicants who have difficulties with paperwork or bureaucratic processes. Nevertheless, in one challenge to a scheme for the allocation of local housing authority mobile home pitches for Gypsies and Travellers, a judge said:

‘Nor, in my view, is it irrational to require that registration on the list must be renewed. Given the small number of pitches and the intense competition for the few pitches that do become available, it is essential that those on the list have a continuing interest and continue to meet the criteria. Without an effective sift of that nature, the list could well become unmanageable and would retain on it those who either had no serious interest in securing a pitch in Hackney, or who had far inferior claims in terms of connection with Hackney. A policy that neglected that requirement might indeed be vulnerable to a challenge on the grounds of irrationality.

I fully recognise . . . that some travellers might well find it burdensome to re-register each year and to keep abreast of any changes in relevant policy, especially those relating to allocation criteria. If a traveller is not able to read and write, as is the case with the claimant, there may be special difficulties in effectively communicating from both sides. However, I am not persuaded that such difficulties, which can potentially lead to unfortunate consequences, vitiate the policy as a whole. The traveller may take appropriate steps to ensure, so far as is practicable, that the person at the c/o address is responsible and is aware of the relevant policy, and is alert to the need for re-registration. The traveller may put in place arrangements by which such person either herself provides the necessary documentation, or takes steps to remind the traveller of what is needed so that the latter can herself take the necessary steps. From the evidence in the case, it is clear that the traveller can attend the Council offices to re-register in person, or to get someone to do that for her, provided the documentation is provided – an extra facility that gives some degree of flexibility to the administrative arrangements.’

Offences in relation to applications

2.41 It is a criminal offence for a person knowingly or recklessly to make a statement which is false in a material particular or knowingly to withhold
2.41 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation

Information which the local housing authority reasonably requires the applicant to give, in connection with the exercise of any of a local housing authority’s functions under HA 1996, Pt 6. A suitable warning to this effect should be included with the information that the applicant receives on, or prior to, making an application. The offence can be committed when making an application or when giving the local housing authority any further information. Guidance suggests that the offence may also be committed during any review procedure. If the false information actually results in the grant of a secure tenancy, it may be possible for the local housing authority to recover possession through the civil courts. Likewise, a private registered provider or registered social landlord that has granted an assured tenancy in such circumstances may recover possession by court proceedings.

4 Housing Act 1988, Sch 2, Ground 17.

2.42 Of course, providing false information can also constitute an offence under the general criminal law. Recent prosecutions under the Fraud Act 2006 and under the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 have been brought against applicants for housing who have given false information or failed to disclose plainly relevant information. Successful prosecutions in housing allocation fraud cases have led to custodial sentences or significant non-custodial penalties.

2.43 Although the title of the Prevention of Social Housing Fraud Act 2013 suggests that it might contain offences and penalties relating to applications for social housing, that Act is primarily concerned with sub-letting of social housing by current tenants. However, the 2013 Act does contain regulation-making powers designed to assist social landlords in conducting investigations into social housing fraud more widely, including in relation to an offence ‘under the Fraud Act 2006 relating to an application for an allocation of housing accommodation under Pt 6 of the Housing Act 1996’.

1 Prevention of Social Housing Fraud Act 2013, s 7(7)(c). The regulations made pursuant to the power are the Prevention of Social Housing Fraud (Power to Require Information) (England) Regulations 2014, SI 2014/899 and the Prevention of Social Housing Fraud (Detection of Fraud) (Wales) Regulations 2014, SI 2014/826 (W 84). See Welsh Code, paras 4.42–4.44.

Assistance in making an application

2.44 As already explained, local housing authorities are required to ensure that free advice and information about the right to make an application for an allocation of social housing is available to people in their districts. But they are also required to ensure that free assistance is provided to anyone in their districts who is likely to have difficulty in making an application. Local housing authorities may provide this assistance directly through their own staff (e.g., in Housing Advice Centres), or may contract the services out to independent advice agencies or other providers.

1 See 2.6–2.12.
2 HA 1996, s 166(1)(a).
4 See Chapter 21.

2.45 The Welsh Code recommends that the written advice and information available to those needing assistance should be available in a range of formats and languages, as appropriate to the needs of the area, including audio tapes, large print versions or Braille copies, as well as copies in the different languages commonly used in the district. Those likely to need information in a different format will obviously also be more likely to need specialist support in making their application for an allocation. The local housing authority will need to have addressed these issues in any equality impact assessments (under the Equality Act 2010) made in relation to the adoption of or changes to the allocation scheme. The Welsh Code advises that local housing authorities should ensure that language and interpretation support is available for those applicants who have difficulty speaking or reading in English.

2.46 Particular issues arise where a local housing authority operates a choice-based letting scheme requiring applicants to bid for advertised properties. Assistance must be made available to those who may need help to bid regularly. The housebound, prisoners, and Gypsies and Travellers may obviously need special help to make applications, as they will not necessarily have access to the internet or be able to attend at pick-up points to collect free sheets describing available properties. Guidance given by the Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC) emphasises that:

‘providers will need to ensure that the online materials are available in accessible formats and that arrangements are in place for those applicants without computer access to get information, in accessible formats, about properties and how to bid for them.’

Local housing authorities might usefully consider how to meet the needs of applicants who are deaf, blind or partially sighted, who have learning disabilities or who cannot read English. Obviously, any reasonable adjustment sought by an applicant on account of his or her disability should be made. For example, an applicant who could not read printed material could require that the local housing authority advise him or her by telephone of suitable properties available. In one case, in which the re-housing of a housebound disabled tenant depended on her husband and full-time carer checking every week what properties had been advertised under a local housing authority’s scheme, the Local Government Ombudsman (LGO) said that ‘it was insensitive to expect someone in [his] position to devote time and energy to bidding for properties’.

2 Guidance for social housing providers (EHRC, September 2017).
3 As of 19 June 2017, the Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman (LGSCO).

2.47 In Housing and the Disability Equality Duty: A guide to the Disability Equality Duty and Disability Discrimination Act 2005 for the social housing sector, the former Disability Rights Commission suggested that when local housing authorities make impact assessments of choice-based lettings arrangements, they should consider these questions:

- Is advertising accessible?
- Are a property’s accessible features advertised?
- Does a mechanism exist to identify the requirements of disabled applicants?
- Is there a mechanism to allow extra time for disabled applicants if they need it?
- Is there a mechanism for providing support in making applications?

Processing applications

2.48 When an application has been received, the local housing authority will normally consider, first, whether an applicant is ‘eligible’ and, if in England, ‘qualified’ for an allocation of social housing under the terms of the statute and its own allocation scheme. It is important that the local housing authority decides eligibility and qualification at the initial application stage, because an applicant permitted to engage with the allocation scheme (eg by being allowed to bid for properties in a choice-based letting scheme) may have a legitimate expectation that he or she will receive full consideration for an allocation. However, the issues of eligibility and qualification may be revisited immediately prior to any prospective allocation to take account of any changed circumstances since the initial application ‘particularly where a substantial amount of time has elapsed since the original application’.

1 See Chapter 3.
2 For a further discussion of ‘legitimate expectation’ see 4.50–4.53.
3 English Code, para 3.2.

2.49 If the local housing authority decides that the applicant is eligible (and, in England, is within a class of qualifying persons), it should then consider, by applying the provisions of its housing allocation scheme:

- whether he or she falls into any of the categories to which it must give reasonable preference;
- whether he or she is entitled to any additional preference;

Applications 2.53

- (if the application is made to a local housing authority in Wales) whether the applicant’s behaviour permits the local housing authority to give him or her no preference at all\(^1\); and
- what increased or reduced priority the applicant is entitled to under the scheme as compared to other applicants\(^4\).

2 HA 1996, s 166A(3) (England), s 167(2) (Wales). See also 4.113–4.144.

4 HA 1996, s 166A(5) (England), s 167(2A) (Wales). See also 4.113–4.144.

2.50 There is no statutory deadline or time limit within which the local housing authority must decide these questions once it has received an application, although a commitment to process applications within a particular period might well be made by a local housing authority in its own allocation scheme. If it becomes plain that the application is not being considered at all, the applicant may need to seek a mandatory order in a claim for judicial review. If the application is being considered, but progress is unduly slow, the applicant may wish to make a complaint under the local housing authority’s own complaints procedure\(^1\) or, if that proves unsatisfactory, seek the help of the LGSCO (in England) or the PSO (in Wales)\(^2\).

1 Information about the local housing authority’s own complaints procedure should be supplied to applicants by the local housing authority itself.
2 See 2.109–2.120 and more generally http://www.lgo.org.uk and www.ombudsman-wales.or g.uk.

2.51 Where a local housing authority is operating a choice-based letting scheme, it may wish to make only a preliminary assessment of an initial application (in order to avoid spending resources on examining in detail applications from applicants who have no realistic prospect of successfully bidding), and to reserve detailed scrutiny to a later stage (eg when an applicant has bid for, and appears to qualify for, the allocation of a particular property).

2.52 Some local housing authorities, operating choice-based letting schemes, may arrange to review applications in detail twice, ie at both the initial application stage and again at the bidding stage. On that model, at the second stage, the application will again be assessed to determine whether the applicant:
- is still eligible; and
- (in England) is still a qualifying person; and
- meets any specific letting criteria for the particular property; and
- still has the appropriate priority for an allocation to be made; and
- matches any size criteria for the property (in light of the composition of the applicant’s household).

2.53 Local housing authorities adopting this approach may find that they are required to notify decisions\(^1\) on more than one occasion for each applicant and will need to include the detail of the procedures that will be operated at each stage in their allocation schemes.

1 See 2.100–2.102.
2.54 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation

2.54 The advice in the English Code relating to double-testing for eligibility and qualification (at the stage of determining the initial application and at the pre-offer stage) does not sit happily with the drafting of the eligibility regulations¹. At least in terms of transitional provisions, those regulations focus on the position when an applicant’s application was first made².

Transfer applications (from current tenants of social housing)

2.55 Not all transfer cases will be handled through the housing allocation scheme arrangements made under HA 1996, Pt 6. That Part does not apply in England or in Wales unless the transfer is tenant-initiated, ie the tenant has made the application for a transfer himself or herself³. A transfer offered to a tenant at the landlord’s initiative (usually called a ‘management transfer’), eg as part of a decanting programme, does not count as triggering the provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, at all⁴.

⁴ English Code, para 1.9, Welsh Code, paras 2.10 and 3.18.

2.56 Where the transfer is tenant-initiated, the secure, assured, introductory, or other tenants of social housing wishing to apply for transfers to alternative social housing accommodation have the same rights as applicants who are not existing social housing tenants:
- to make applications;
- to have their applications considered;
- to be notified as to their rights to information and review; and
- to have the fact of their application kept confidential⁵.

Applications to a local housing authority by current tenants of social housing can be made not only by tenants of that local housing authority but also by tenants of any other social landlord (whether a different local housing authority or a private registered provider or registered social landlord)⁶. However, as explained below, the provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, relating to transfers operate differently in respect of applications made to local housing authorities in Wales from the way they operate in England.

⁶ English Code, para 1.5.

2.57 In both England and Wales, transfer applications will initially be treated in the same way as all other applications⁷, except that the local housing authority should not make inquiries into the eligibility of transfer applicants. That is because secure or introductory tenants, and assured tenants of social landlords, are eligible for a further allocation regardless of their immigration or habitual residence status⁸.

³ HA 1996, s 159(4B)(b) (England), s 159(5) (Wales).
⁴ English Code, para 1.9, Welsh Code, paras 2.10 and 3.18.
⁵ Welsh Code, paras 3.17–3.18.
⁶ HA 1996, s 160ZA(5) (England), s 160A(6) (Wales). Note that, in respect of assured tenants, the exemption from the eligibility requirement in Wales is only available to those who were granted that tenancy as a result of an allocation by a local housing authority in Wales. English Code, para 3.4 and Welsh Code, para 2.13(i). For ‘eligibility’ see Chapter 3.

2.58 In Wales, subject to that exception, all transfer applications made to local housing authorities will be handled through the local allocation scheme. Local housing authorities in Wales have been asked by the Welsh Government to ensure that social housing tenants who are under-occupying get particular assistance when they apply for transfers1.

1 Welsh Code, para 3.17.

2.59 In England, however, even if a tenant of social housing makes an unsolicited application for a transfer, the provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, will still not apply unless the local housing authority is satisfied that the transfer applicant qualifies for a ‘reasonable preference’ under HA 1996, s 166A(3)1. Deciding whether a transfer applicant is within a ‘reasonable preference’ category is therefore a preliminary issue for local housing authorities in England.

1 HA 1996, s 159(4B)(c), English Code, para 2.3.

2.60 If the transfer applicant does fall into such a category, he or she will be dealt with under the allocation scheme1. For non-priority transfer applicants, ie applicants who do not qualify for a reasonable preference, the local housing authority can operate separate arrangements either outside, or alongside, the local allocation scheme. Alternatively, all applicants could be dealt with through one overarching housing allocation system applying both to HA 1996, Pt 6 applicants and non-priority transfer applicants2. The local housing authority will have to decide what prioritisation arrangements it will apply as between that transfer applicant and all others and, perhaps most crucially, whether to expose a newly available letting to demand from the applicants on the local allocation scheme or, instead, to offer it to one or more of those on the non-priority transfer list3.

1 English Code, paras 1.5 and 2.3.
2 English Code, para 1.8.
3 The latter alternative may be particularly compelling if there a significant numbers of current social housing tenants under-occupying their homes and willing to move.

2.61 Taking non-priority transfer applicants out of the HA 1996, Pt 6, regime was perceived to be a means of facilitating greater mobility within social housing. The statutory guidance accordingly encourages local housing authorities to use this flexibility, particularly to assist tenants who are presently under-occupying social housing1. However, this policy intention of stimulating greater mobility among social housing tenants was not immediately realised. The 2010–15 UK Coalition Government was particularly concerned about tenants wishing to move to take up employment or training opportunities and in September 2014, it undertook a consultation2 on proposals designed to achieve what would have amounted to a ‘right to move’ for such transfer applicants within the framework of HA 1996, Pt 63. The latest statutory Code of Guidance issued in England in 2015 is solely concerned with this issue and encourages local housing authorities to take a ‘flexible approach’ to applicants.
2.61 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation for transfers wanting to move for work-related reasons. The Welsh Government considers that the flexibility sought to be achieved by the new regulations made in England ‘already exists within the reasonable preference hardship grounds’.

1 English Code, paras 1.6–1.7.
2 Right to Move Consultation (DCLG, September 2014) and Right to Move: Response to Consultation (DCLG, 2015).
3 Housing Mobility Schemes (House of Commons Library, Standard Note SN04696, 14 November 2014) contains a useful review of the relevant issues.
5 Welsh Code, para 3.36.

2.62 Even with this guidance, it appears that few local housing authorities are making use of the greater latitude. A poll published in 2015 found that only 30% of the respondent social landlords had used the increased flexibility to assess transfer applications separately.

1 The poll was conducted by the Chartered Institute of Housing and reported in Inside Housing (February 2015).

2.63 Local housing authorities in England which have exercised their powers to specify classes of applicants as qualifying (or not qualifying) for allocation under HA 1996, Pt 6, may decide to apply the same or different qualifying criteria to those transfer applicants to whom HA 1996, Pt 6, applies (ie those in the reasonable preference categories). The statutory guidance suggests that there might be sound policy reasons for applying different (more relaxed) criteria to transfer applicants. In response to an amendment to the Localism Bill, which would have prevented any qualification requirements being applied to transferring tenants, the government minister said:

‘We are producing secondary legislation that will outline when local authorities can and cannot prevent people transferring. If there were any evidence that local authorities were disqualifying transferring tenants inappropriately, that would be covered by that secondary legislation, which will not be on hand immediately but is coming’.

1 HA 1996, s 160ZA(7).
3 Which subsequently became the Localism Act 2011.
4 Hansard, Lords Debates, 5 September 2011, col 32.

2.64 Such regulations have since been made to prevent the qualification criteria of ‘local connection’ being applied to applicants for transfers from one housing authority area to another for work-related reasons.

2.65 Transfer applicants to whom the provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, apply will enjoy the same rights to be notified of decisions on their applications (and to be informed of their rights to request information) as those described above in relation to new applicants. Those non-priority transfer applicants in England being dealt with outside the provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, have no formal statutory rights in relation to decision-making or notification and will need to rely on any references made to their circumstances in documents published by the local housing authority, such as a non-statutory Transfers Policy or Transfers Scheme. The local housing authority is only legally obliged to maintain rules relating to transfers by secure tenants and to publish a summary of those rules.\(^1\)

HA 1985, s 106(1)(a) and (2).

Procedure for handling applications

2.66 There is no prescribed national code in either England or Wales as to the way in which applications must be processed. The respective national authorities have the reserve power to prescribe by regulations the ‘principles’ that should govern allocation procedures, but the power has not been used except to limit the role of elected members in allocation of properties (see 2.75–2.76)\(^1\). The procedure being followed will therefore be that set out in the particular local housing authority’s own allocation scheme. This must cover all aspects of the allocation process, including the identity (or description) of the staff by whom decisions will be taken. The relevant statutory regulators of social housing in each country will set and enforce national standards for housing allocation in exercise of their respective statutory powers.\(^2\)

1. HA 1996, s 166A(10) (England), s 167(5) (Wales).

2. HA 1996, s 166A(1) (England), s 167(1) (Wales).

3. See 1.31 and 1.36.

2.67 In dealing with an application for an allocation of social housing, there is no statutory duty upon the local housing authority to ‘make… inquiries’ into the application (in contrast to the position in relation to applications for homelessness assistance in England)\(^1\) nor a duty to make an ‘assessment’ (of the type required on an application for homelessness assistance in England and Wales)\(^2\). The extent of any investigation of an application will be outlined in the local allocation scheme. It will, however, be subject to the public law duty which requires a decision-maker to ask the right questions and take reasonable steps to acquaint him or herself with the relevant information to enable him or herself to answer them correctly\(^3\). Further, where the information before the local housing authority raises a real possibility that the applicant or member of their household may be disabled, the public sector equality duty is likely to impose a duty to make further inquiries\(^4\). Where, for example, a letter from a GP stated that the local housing authority should send a medical questionnaire and fee form if more information was required, the local housing authority was at fault in deciding that the medical evidence did not address the applicant’s mobility needs and suitability of his accommodation without contacting the GP to seek more information\(^5\).

1. HA 1996, s 184(1). See Chapter 9. Indeed, the local housing authority will not owe an applicant a ‘duty of care’ in the handling of the application at all: Darby v Richmond Upon Thames London Borough Council [2015] EWHC 909 (QB), (2015) June Legal Action, p 45 QB. An application for permission to appeal to the Court of Appeal was refused: [2017] EWCA Civ 252. 5 Complaint against Royal London Borough of Kensington and Chelsea, 16 007 264, 11 January 2017.

2.68 The absence of rigorous statutory control of the process of allocating social housing, and the corresponding flexibility given to local housing authorities, can lead to situations in which both applicants and officials are free to abuse local arrangements for social housing allocation. It is therefore important that local housing authorities not only have detailed procedures, and structures for delegation of decision-making, set out in their allocation schemes but also that these are properly monitored and enforced by the local housing authorities themselves. The English Code advises local housing authorities to consider taking action to minimise the risks of staff fraud and error in allocations, including the vetting of junior staff and the use of senior staff to randomly check and validate decisions on applications.2 The guidance was drawn up in the light of a striking instance of a member of staff having access to, and abusing, the allocation processes in the largest local housing authority in England (Birmingham)2.

1 English Code, para 5.13.

2.69 A lack of clarity as to how applications are determined is also likely to result in unfairness to the applicant. The LGO1 was asked to investigate a case where the applicant had not been informed that he was required to submit evidence by a certain date and had not been warned that failure to respond in time would lead to his application being removed from the register. The local housing authority was found to be at fault for these omissions2.

Applications which trigger other responsibilities

2.70 It may be plain, from the terms in which the applicant has completed the local housing authority’s application form, that there is a need for other assistance, even before consideration of the application for social housing allocation is completed.

2.71 If the form provides material which gives a local housing authority in England reason to believe that the applicant may be homeless or threatened with homelessness, it must make the inquiries necessary to establish whether it owes the applicant a duty under the homelessness legislation1. This is because an application for social housing is an application ‘for accommodation’, which may trigger the threshold for inquiries into any potential homelessness2. If the application for social housing allocation is made to a local housing authority in Wales and it appears to the local housing authority that, on the material in the application form, the person may be homeless or threatened with homelessness, the local housing authority must then conduct the ‘assessment’ required by homelessness legislation in Wales, in addition to processing the social housing application.

1. HA 1996, Pt 7 (‘Homelessness: England’) as amended by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see Chapter 9.

2. HA 1996, ss 183–184, as amended by HRA 2017, ss 4(3) and 5(3), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. Discussed further in Chapter 9; and see R (Bilverstone) v Oxford City Council [2003] EWHC 2434 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 170 (Oct), Admin Ct and English Homelessness Code (MHCLG, February 2018), para 18.6.

2.72 Likewise, if the local housing authority is also an adult care and children’s services authority, the application may trigger responsibilities under community care or child care legislation. For example, if the application reveals that:

1. the applicant is a ‘child in need’ under the age of 18; and
2. he or she is seeking accommodation because the person with parental responsibility is unable to accommodate any longer, the children’s services authority may itself owe a statutory duty to accommodate under the Children Act 1989 (in England) or the Social Services and Well-being (Wales) Act 2014 (in Wales).

Repeat applications

2.73 In principle, there is nothing to stop an unsuccessful applicant from making a further application at any stage. However, in practice, unless the applicant’s circumstances have changed, the decision will be likely to be the same. Indeed, if an application has been fully considered, fairly and on its merits, a local housing authority is entitled to deal with a later re-application on the same facts by asserting that the matter has already been determined, in the absence of any material change of circumstances.

2.74 HA 1996, Pt 6, specifically provides for re-applications in two circumstances:
2.74 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation

(1) an applicant who has been treated as ineligible by a local housing authority in Wales on account of his or her conduct can make a fresh application at any time, and the Code suggests that, in such a case, it will be for the applicant to show that his or her behaviour or circumstances have changed1; and

(2) if a local housing authority in England decides that a person is not qualified for an allocation because he or she does not fall within a category of qualifying persons, that person can re-apply if he or she considers that he or she should be treated as a qualifying person2. The Code suggests that on such a re-application it would be for the applicant to show that his or her circumstances have changed3. This is incorrect: and in any event it may be that there has been no change of personal circumstances but the local housing authority may have simply changed its qualifying criteria.

DECISION-MAKING

The role of councillors

2.75 Elected members are prohibited from taking part in any decisions on an individual allocation if the accommodation is in their electoral ward or if the person subject to the allocation decision has a sole or main residence in their electoral ward1. Elected members can, of course, seek and obtain information on behalf of their constituents, and participate in more general policy decisions that affect their wards2.

1 Allocation of Housing (Procedure) Regulations 1997, SI 1997/483, reg 3(2) (England) and Local Housing Authorities (Prescribed Principles for Allocation Schemes) (Wales) Regulations 1997, SI 1997/45, reg 3, Sch 1, para 1. See also English Code, paras 4.35–4.37; Welsh Code, paras 4.35–4.37. In Heesom v Public Services Ombudsman for Wales [2014] EWHC 1504 (Admin), [2014] 4 All ER 269, Admin Ct, a fact-finding tribunal determined that a particular councillor’s conduct ‘drove a coach and horses through the Council’s housing policy. Certainly, it undermined the Council’s policy in respect of housing allocation (based upon the 1997 Regulations) in a particularly persistent manner, and in a way designed deliberately to cross the dividing line between the functions of council members and their officers’, per Hickinbottom J at [116].

2 A local housing authority’s practice of inviting elected councillors to comment at the point of a potential allocation was criticised by the Public Service Ombudsman for Wales as giving the impression that there might be undue influence: Housing Allocation and Homelessness in Wales: A Special Report by the Local Ombudsman for Wales (February 2006).

2.76 In R (Hussain) v Sandwell Metropolitan Borough Council1, the claimant councillor’s application for judicial review to prevent the defendant council continuing its investigations into his conduct was dismissed. An internal report had raised a number of concerns about the claimant’s conduct, including issues relating to housing allocations over twenty years. An investigation into the allocation of ten local housing authority owned properties found:

‘patterns of behaviour exhibiting features of a conspiracy to defraud and / or misconduct in public office. The outcome of a number of housing allocation decisions appeared to benefit members of the Claimant’s family. The evidence suggested a “repeat pattern of use of a number of factors that allowed members of Councillor Hussain’s family to be allocated Council properties”.

Green J found that on the evidence before the court, there was a ‘serious prima facie case’ against the claimant councillor and that the allegations against him should be investigated.

Decisions on applications

2.77 As already noted (see 2.50), there is no statutory time limit within which a decision must be reached or within which the applicant must be notified of the outcome of his or her application for social housing, although any local housing authority may include such a time limit in its local scheme and the LGSCO has repeatedly found fault with local housing authorities which have delayed making decisions on applications.

2.78 For some applicants, the outcome of the application will be notification of successful entry onto the waiting list for a housing allocation. This may be a simple letter indicating that the applicant will in future be considered for an allocation based on the material provided in the application form or, where there is a local choice-based letting system, that the applicant is free to make bids for available properties. What the applicant most probably wants to know, and may not have been automatically told, is when, realistically, the application will result in an allocation of social housing (ie selection for the offer of a tenancy of a house or flat). The applicant is entitled to ask for information, in writing, about precisely that: whether housing accommodation is likely to be made available and, if so, how long it is likely to be before it is made available1.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(9)(a)(ii) (England), s 167(4A)(a)(ii) (Wales); see 2.18–2.20.

2.79 For other applicants, however, the notification will be that their application has been wholly or partly unsuccessful. The most serious adverse decision that an applicant could receive is that he or she is ‘ineligible for an allocation’ or (in England) not qualified for allocation1. The legal framework for decisions on eligibility or qualification and the obligations when notifying such decisions are discussed in Chapter 32. Other adverse decisions, and the notification obligations attaching to them, are dealt with in this and later chapters3.

Notifying decisions

2.80 Curiously, while every local housing authority must accept applications for social housing made in accordance with its allocation scheme and determine them, there is no express statutory obligation on local housing
2.80 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation

Authorities to give written notification of all decisions or to give reasons for them. No doubt these matters were thought so central to good administrative practice as not to require explicit mention in HA 1996, Pt 6, because they will be included in the allocation scheme adopted by any reasonable local housing authority.

2.81 However, if a local housing authority decides that an applicant is ‘ineligible’ for its allocation scheme¹, or (in England) that he is not a ‘qualifying’ person², or (in Wales) that he or she is not to be given any preference on the grounds of unacceptable behaviour³, those decisions must be notified to the applicant in writing⁴.

² See Chapter 3.
³ See 4.150–4.164.
⁴ HA 1996, s 160ZA(9) and (10), (England), and s 167(4A)(b) (Wales).

2.82 In each of the above cases, the decision must be ‘notified’ to the applicant, meaning that it should actually be received by him or her¹. However, in the case of a decision that the applicant is not eligible or not qualified, the decision is additionally treated as having been given to the applicant:

‘if it is made available at the authority’s office for a reasonable period for collection by him [or her] or on his [or her] behalf².’

² HA 1996, s 160ZA(10) (England), s 160A(10) (Wales); Welsh Code, para 2.53.

2.83 This treating provision only applies if the applicant does not actually receive the decision notice. If the applicant does receive the decision, any time limits run from the date of receipt, not from a notional date when the applicant could have collected the decision. An attempt to supplement the statutory rubric by the addition of the words ‘and the applicant has previously been informed that the notice will be available and how it can be collected’ was rejected by the government because the effect of the additional words ‘is really a matter of good administrative practice, and might well be expected of local authorities as a matter of course’¹.

2.84 The applicant is also entitled to be given reasons for those three types of decisions. The statutory guidance suggests that the notification should give clear grounds for the decision ‘based on the relevant facts of the case’¹ and that where a particular applicant may have difficulty understanding the implications of the decision ‘it would be good practice to make arrangements for the information to be explained verbally in addition to providing a written notice’². Obviously, the reasons should be carefully considered. If the local housing authority gives several distinct reasons for its decision on an application for an allocation, it may find the whole decision is rendered unlawful even if only one of the reasons was given in error although, conversely, if it is highly likely that the decision would not have been substantially different had the illegality not occurred, then a challenge to the court will fail.

4 Senior Courts Act 1981, s 31(2A).

2.85 Even if the statutory rights of notification do not apply, good administrative practice and procedural fairness will require that an applicant be notified of a decision on his or her application. He or she should in addition be given reasons for a decision that is against their interests. In a case concerning Birmingham City Council, the LGO found fault where the local housing authority’s letter telling the applicant that she had not been awarded medical priority failed to explain the reasoning for the decision.

1 In the case of Complaint against Epping Forest District Council, 16 004 599, 7 November 2016, the LGO found fault where the council did not inform the applicant that it had decided to suspend his application.

REVIEWS

Right to a review

2.86 A local housing authority is free to provide in its allocation scheme that all of the decisions it takes on an application for social housing will carry a right to a review by the authority at the applicant’s request. However, HA 1996, Pt 6, imposes a minimum requirement that all allocation schemes must be framed so as to provide a right to a review of certain important decisions. Strictly speaking, the review being undertaken is never a statutory review. It is always a review provided for by the allocation scheme and not pursuant to an absolute statutory right. This is not a mere matter of semantics. If, for some reason, a badly drafted scheme had not been framed so as to include the minimum review rights envisaged by HA 1996, Pt 6, it would be necessary for an applicant first to apply for a mandatory order (by way of judicial review proceedings) requiring the local housing authority to amend its scheme so as to include the review rights and then, once they were included, that applicant could exercise them.

2.87 HA 1996, Pt 6, requires that rights to review of the following categories of decisions made by a local housing authority relating to an applicant are included in any allocation scheme:

1 a decision that the applicant is not eligible for an allocation;
2 a decision concerning the facts of his or her case which are likely to be, or have been, taken into account in considering whether to allocate accommodation;
3 a decision by a local housing authority in England that he or she is not within a class of persons qualifying for an allocation; and
4 a decision by a local housing authority in Wales that he or she is not to be awarded any reasonable preference, to which he or she would otherwise be entitled, on the grounds of unacceptable behaviour⁴.
2.87 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation

HA 1996, s 160ZA(9)(a) and s 166A(9)(c) (England), s 160A(9) and s 167(4A)(d) (Wales).

HA 1996, s 166A(9)(b) and (c) (England), s 167(4A)(c) and (d) (Wales).

HA 1996, s 167(4A)(b) and (d).

2.88 The first, third and fourth categories of decisions listed refer to decisions taken under specific statutory provisions, and the applicant will have been notified in writing of those decisions with reasons.

2.89 The second category of decision carrying a right to a review is much more wide-ranging. From the wording, it is reasonable to assume that it includes decisions about:

1. the type of property for which an applicant will be considered;

2. the extent of the applicant’s household to be considered for housing with him or her¹;

3. the applicant’s medical condition or other welfare needs;

4. other facts used to determine whether the applicant is entitled to a reasonable preference;

5. whether the applicant should receive additional preference on the grounds of urgent housing needs or otherwise; and

6. determining the applicant’s priority, including his or her financial resources, behaviour (or that of his or her family), and local connection where the scheme renders any of these relevant.

2.90 This second category carrying a right to request a review, therefore, opens the door for an applicant to request an internal review, and consequent reconsideration, of nearly all the adverse decisions (if any) that are made on his or her application.

2.91 However, unlike the decisions on eligibility, qualification (in England) or unacceptable behaviour (in Wales), there is no automatic notification of the initial decision to the applicant in this second category of decisions. If the applicant has not been notified of the decision in question then, for him or her even to access the right to request a review, he or she must first request the local housing authority to inform him or her of its decision about a particular fact, or set of facts, about his or her case⁴. Only having made that request, and having received the response, can the applicant then sensibly request a review although there is no statutory obligation on the local housing authority to provide reasons when notifying this class of decision.

2.92 As already indicated (see 2.86), the statutory requirements relating to reviews of decisions, on applications for social housing allocation, represent the legal minimum. There is nothing to prevent a local housing authority from adopting an allocation scheme which allows for a review of additional categories of adverse decisions or of all adverse decisions.
2.93 On the nature of the review that needs to be undertaken, it is reasonable to assume that Parliament at least intended reviews of decisions made within HA 1996, Pt 6, to have the same function as reviews within HA 1996, Pt 5 (‘Conduct of Tenants’)
1 and Pt 7 (‘Homelessness’), ie a reconsideration of all the relevant facts and law at the time that the review is decided, not a narrow review confining itself to the legality or fairness of the original decision.

1 HA 1996, s 129 gives an introductory tenant the right to request a review of his or her landlord’s decision to seek an order for possession and the Introductory Tenancy (Review Procedures) Regulations 1997, SI 1997/72 regulate the procedure on review.

2 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see Chapter 19.

3 For a discussion of the scope of reviews in the homelessness context see 19.166–19.174.

Procedure on review

2.94 There are no statutory provisions governing review procedure in relation to social housing allocation. There are, for example, no statutorily specified time limits within which a review must be requested and no statutorily prescribed form or procedure for making the request for a review. All and any procedural requirements must be set out in the particular allocation scheme under which a review is being pursued.

2.95 The Secretary of State and Welsh Ministers are empowered to make regulations governing ‘the procedure to be followed’ on housing allocation, which appears, from the wording, to encompass any procedural matters under the allocation scheme, including any procedure relating to requests for review
1. However, no regulations have been made in exercise of that power.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(10) (England) and s 167(5) (Wales).

2.96 In this procedural vacuum, it will be for every local housing authority to spell out the review procedures in its own allocation scheme. This will inevitably mean different review procedures in almost every part of the country, subject to the usual public and administrative law protections of natural justice and procedural fairness and the high standards of administration which applicants should be entitled to expect from a local housing authority.

2.97 The English Code suggests that review procedures should be clearly set out in allocation schemes, should include ‘timescales for each stage of the review process, and must accord with the principles of transparency and fairness’
1. It sets out six general principles of good administrative practice that local housing authorities are expected to apply when making provision for review procedures in their allocation schemes and when undertaking reviews. They are as follows:

1. Applicants should be notified of the timescale within which they must request a review. 21 days from the date the applicant is notified of the decision is well-established as a reasonable timescale. A housing authority should retain the discretion to extend this time limit in exceptional circumstances.

2. Applicants should be notified that the request for review should be made in writing, and that it would also be acceptable for the request to be submitted...
2.97 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation by a representative on their behalf. Applicants should also be advised of the information which should accompany the request.

3. Authorities should consider whether to advise that provision can be made for verbal representations, as well as written submissions, to be made.

4. The review should be carried out by an officer who is senior to the person who made the original decision. Alternatively, authorities may wish to appoint a panel to consider the review. If so, it should not include any person involved in the original decision.

5. The review should be considered on the basis of the authority’s allocation scheme, any legal requirements and all relevant information. This should include information provided by the applicant on any relevant developments since the original decision was made – for instance, the settlement of arrears or establishment of a repayment plan, or departure of a member of the household responsible for anti-social behaviour.

6. Reviews should be completed wherever practicable within a set deadline.
Eight weeks is suggested as a reasonable timescale. The applicant should be notified of any extension to this deadline and the reasons for this.¹

² English Code, para 5.19.

2.98 In relation to adverse decisions on ‘eligibility’, or ‘no preference’ made by local housing authorities in Wales, the Welsh Code recommends that allocation schemes adopt the following as ‘fair procedure’ in relation to reviews:

• ensuring that notifications of decisions include advice on the right to request a review, the time within which the request must be made, and sources of advice and assistance;
• ensuring that applicants have an opportunity to request further information about any decision about the facts of their case;
• advising applicants that they may request a review by way of an oral hearing or a written submission;
• ensuring that the review is carried out by a person who was not involved in the original decision and, if the reviewer is to be another officer, one senior to the original decision-maker;
• ensuring that the circumstances of the applicant at the time of the review, not just at the time of the original decision, are taken into account;
• if there is not to be a hearing, allowing the applicant to make written representations, and informing the applicant of the date by which those representations must be received, giving the applicant at least 5 clear days’ notice;
• if there is to be a hearing, giving notice to the applicant of the date, time and place no sooner than five days after the request for a hearing (unless the applicant consents to lesser notice);
• ensuring that the reviewer determines the procedure to be adopted for hearings, and that the procedure gives the applicant the right to be heard, to be accompanied, to be represented by a lawyer or other person, to call witnesses to give evidence, to put questions to any witness and to make written representations;
Reviews 2.100

- ensuring that, if a person having been given notice should fail to appear at the hearing, the reviewer has regard to all the circumstances, including any explanation offered for the absence and should be able to proceed with the hearing or give any directions he or she thinks proper for the conduct of a further review;
- ensuring that the reviewer will allow applicants to be able to request a postponement of a hearing, and will grant or refuse the request as the reviewer sees fit;
- ensuring that the reviewer should be able to adjourn the hearing at any time during the hearing on the applicant’s application, or if the reviewer otherwise sees fit. If, at a re-scheduled hearing, the identity of the reviewer has changed, the hearing should be a complete re-hearing of the case;
- ensuring that, where more than one person is conducting the review, the review should only proceed in the absence of one of the reviewers if the applicant consents;
- ensuring that the applicant is notified of the decision on the review and, if the decision confirms the original decision, of the reasons for it;
- ensuring that the applicant is notified of any right to re-apply; and
- ensuring that the review is conducted in the applicant’s language of choice.

Welsh Code, para 2.55.

2.99 In the absence of explicit statutory provisions and given a wide variety of locally adopted procedures, it has been left to the courts to scrutinise individual review decisions and review procedures on a case-by-case basis applying traditional administrative law principles (outlined in Chapter 19)\(^1\). The courts have developed some expertise in scrutinising the role of reviewing officers in reviews conducted of decisions made within the introductory tenancy and homelessness regimes of HA 1996\(^2\), so that the move to judicial scrutiny of review procedures in the housing allocation field has been relatively straightforward (see 2.103).

\(^1\) For examples of challenges to internal review arrangements on decisions about social housing allocation see \(R v\) Tower Hamlets London Borough Council ex p Spencer (1995) 29 HLR 64, QBD (a challenge brought under Housing Act 1985) and \(R v\) Southwark London Borough Council ex p Mason (2000) 32 HLR 88, QBD (a challenge to a review panel’s decision on the suitability of accommodation offered under the allocation scheme).

Notifying review decisions

2.100 Each allocation scheme must be framed in terms that provide for an applicant who has sought a review to be notified of the decision on review and the grounds for it\(^1\). This requirement is interpreted in the statutory guidance as meaning that there should usually be provision in the allocation scheme for delivery of a written statement of the review decision and of the reasons for it\(^2\).

2.101 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation

2.101 In one case, in which the adequacy of the reasons given in a review decision was challenged, despite the decision being set out in a lengthy letter to the applicant, a judge said¹:

‘In my view proper, adequate and intelligible reasons are set out in the decision letter. The reasons are stated “in sufficient detail” to enable [the Claimant] to know what conclusion [the decision maker] has reached on the “principal important controversial issues” (Bolton Metropolitan Borough Council v Secretary of State for the Environment [1995] 3 PLR 37, 43C, Lord Lloyd; and see William v Wandsworth LBC [2006] HLR 42 at para 18). Moreover [the reviewing officer] balanced competing factors and explained why he concluded that some outweighed others.’

2.102 In another case, the local housing authority’s correspondence relating to a decision on eligibility was described as ‘opaque’, but a challenge based on inadequate reasons was rejected as the claimant himself was well apprised of the issues being addressed¹.

Challenges to review decisions (and non-reviewable decisions) about particular applications

2.103 Any legal challenges to review decisions, or to any decisions about individual applications that do not carry the right to request a review, can only be brought by judicial review, on the grounds that the local housing authority has infringed some requirement of public or administrative law, or has failed to comply with the duty to supply the grounds for the decision¹.

¹ The duty to supply reasons in an allocation case is set out at 2.84. The classic grounds upon which judicial review claims can be mounted are discussed at 19.225–19.231.

2.104 Judicial review challenges to allocation decisions tend to fall into two distinct categories:

(1) challenges to the allocation scheme itself (or to some part of it); and
(2) challenges to particular decisions made relating to particular applicants.

2.105 This part of this chapter is concerned only with the latter. Challenges to the contents of allocation schemes are dealt with in CHAPTER 4¹. Of course, occasionally, both forms of challenge may be available in a particular case. For an example of a judicial review which involved both forms of challenge see R (Woolfe) v Islington London Borough Council⁴.

2.106 As far as individual decisions are concerned, an applicant seeking to challenge such a decision would have to show that it was made contrary to the provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, or of the local housing authority’s allocation scheme, or that it had been reached by applying an unfair or unlawful procedure, or that it was based on some other mistake of law (or, in some circumstances, a mistake of fact). In one unsuccessful case, the challenge to the decision of a reviewing officer on an issue about eligibility for social housing allocation was described as containing 'the familiar complaints that he had misdirected himself, failed to take into account relevant circumstances, and/or failed to give adequate reasons'. Familiar as they may be, those complaints can sometimes be made out by an applicant in an appropriate case. For example, when considering whether to apply a discretionary provision in an allocation scheme, a local housing authority must act fairly by giving an applicant an opportunity to deal with matters likely to be weighed against him or her. In another case, the local housing authority had misapplied its own policy and in consequence had failed lawfully to consider whether the claimant was entitled to 'New Generation' points. Local housing authorities have also been found to have erred by failing to take into account or to give proper weight to relevant evidence, namely the conclusions of their own Children's Services assessment.

2.107 Claims for judicial review have been particularly successful in relation to decisions on medical needs assessment for the purposes of allocation schemes. In one case, a local housing authority’s assessment failed to address issues raised by the applicant’s medical advisers and gave insufficient reasons for a refusal to accord the highest medical priority in the local scheme. In another, the medical assessment was based on medical advice commissioned by the local housing authority, but that advice had failed to address particular points and specific materials put forward by the applicant’s advisers. In a third case, the decision to refuse a claimant entry to the housing register was flawed because it had relied ‘word for word’ on a medical assessment in which the doctor had improperly commented on issues that had no medical dimension. In a fourth case, a local housing authority’s decisions were:

‘insufficiently reasoned as to the criteria applied as to how medical need can or fails to come within the doctrine of reasonable preference and how the evidence has been related to the criteria that are applied.’

2.108 Information, Applications and Decisions in Respect of Allocation

2.108 In a fifth case, the medical advisers engaged by the local housing authority had gone beyond their remit and advised as to the relative priority of the applicant to others in housing need. The local housing authority had wrongly taken into account those non-medical opinions and relied upon them.

2.109 Where judicial review is unavailable, the applicant should invoke the local housing authority’s own internal complaints procedure and, if still dissatisfied, can then complain of maladministration to the LGSCO (in England) or the PSO (in Wales). Dissatisfied applicants for social housing can also seek redress through the intervention of the relevant national regulators of social housing providers.

2 See 1.30–1.39.

2.110 Complaints to the Ombudsmen may be pursued by complainants personally or by their legal advisers. The latter will need to consider carefully how such assistance might be remunerated.

2.111 Both the English and Welsh Ombudsmen Services have produced fact-sheets for applicants who may want to complain about housing application matters. For applicants, the LGSCO has identified the sorts of complaints against a local housing authority that he or she may investigate:

• It is using an allocation scheme that is not clear or fair;
• It has failed to apply the allocation scheme properly or fairly failed to follow the Government’s code of guidance on housing allocation;
• It did not take relevant information into account in reaching its decision, or took irrelevant information into account;
• It failed to give you information you should have (for example, about the priority awarded to your application or how to challenge the priority given to it); or
• It delayed in dealing with your application, changes in your situation, or with an appeal from you about the priority given to your application.’

1 Fact Sheet – H2 Complaints about your housing application (LGO, March 2014).

2.112 The LGSCO has provided a similar indicative list relating to complaints arising from transfer applications. The complaints likely to be investigated include:

• delay in processing your application;
• losing your application or other documents;
• turning down or suspending your application for no good reason;
• not assessing your application in line with the council’s allocations policy;
• making a mistake, such as getting your application date wrong, not giving you the points you should have, or putting you in the wrong band;
failing to take special factors into account, such as overcrowding or medical problems; not offering accommodation to you, including losing a bid made through a choice-based lettings scheme; or unreasonable delay in responding to correspondence.’

However, since April 2013, the LGSCO has only had responsibility for complaints relating to transfer applications that fall within HA 1996, Pt 6. Complaints relating to management transfers or to transfer applications from those outside the ‘reasonable preference’ categories are instead within the jurisdiction of the Housing Ombudsman.

1  Fact Sheet – H1 Complaints about your housing transfers (LGO, March 2013).

2.113 Since April 2013, the LGSCO website has carried details of all housing allocation complaints examined, in the interests of greater transparency. The details are posted after three months have expired from the last stage of the consideration of the particular complaint. Some of the most important decisions noted on the LGSCO website appear later, in summary form, in the monthly column Recent Developments in Housing Law in Legal Action magazine.

1  The housing allocation decisions are gathered (in reverse chronological order, latest first) at www.lgo.org.uk/decisions/housing/allocations.

2.114 In January 2016, the LGO issued a special focus report on its handling of complaints about housing allocation. The report ‘highlights the severe impact on people when councils have got it wrong and the common issues we find in our investigations into housing allocations’.

1  As of 19 June 2017, the LGSCO.
2  Full House: Council’s role in allocating social housing (LGO, January 2016).

2.115 Where such faults caused injustice, the report indicated that the LGO asked local housing authorities to:

- backdate an application or priority award;
- correctly allocate priority or waiting time;
- enhance priority or waiting time (particularly appropriate if there has been a delay);
- carry out a medical assessment and make appropriate provision;
- carry out a review of a decision; or
- allow a person to go on the housing list.

1  As of 19 June 2017, the LGSCO.

2.116 The LGSCO may also ask a local housing authority to review not just individual decisions but also its allocation scheme in general. In one recent case the local housing authority was asked to review the definition of ‘child’ in its scheme, which was unclear. In another, the LGO recommended that the local housing authority ‘review its scheme to clarify the definition of “settled accommodation” and clarify how it deals with circumstances where someone moves out of the area into less settled accommodation’.

Complaint against Epping Forest District Council, 15 020 774, 9 September 2016.

2.117 The Public Services Ombudsman for Wales (PSOW) has indicated that, in relation to both new applications and transfer requests, he can look at:

- whether your housing application has been dealt with properly.
- whether the Council or housing association has properly applied its policy to your housing application e.g. are you in the correct band?
- whether the organisation has told you how it has dealt with your housing application e.g. has it sent you a letter detailing any points awarded?
- whether the organisation has delayed dealing with changes in your situation which you have told it about e.g. you have been asked to leave your home.
- why your application may have been suspended e.g. has the Council followed the correct procedure if the reason(s) for suspension is your behaviour?

Housing Application Factsheet (PSOW, undated).

2.118 The Welsh Code suggests that applicants for local housing authority or housing association accommodation may complain to the PSOW if they consider they have been treated unfairly, or have received a bad service through some failure on the part of the organisation and that local housing authorities and housing associations are ‘obliged by law’ to inform applicants of their rights to complain to the PSOW.

2.119 Recent investigation reports from the LGSCO and PSOW indicate that significant awards of compensation may be recommended if maladministration has caused injustice to individuals who have applied for the allocation of social housing:

- A family of six, with four children aged between 14 and 18, two of whom had disabilities, lived in a three-bedroom house. They had been on the local housing authority’s housing register for thirteen years when they were asked to complete a new application. The Ombudsman found that the information provided should have prompted the local housing authority to visit the property to ascertain whether the family were statutorily overcrowded, which it did not do; further, it had wrongly said it could only consider the needs of one household member; it should have recognized that this was a complex case requiring a cross-agency referral, but did not; it failed to consider exercising its discretion to take account of the family’s exceptional circumstances; it failed to explain to the family how it could help them secure private rented accommodation; and it provided inaccurate information about what properties they would be able to bid on. The Ombudsman found that, as a result of the local housing authority’s fault, the amended family had lived in unsuitable accommodation for nearly two and a half years longer than was necessary. The Ombudsman recommended that the local housing authority pay the family £8,650 and apologise to them.

Reviews 2.119

• A middle-aged single disabled man living with his mother (who was a tenant of the local housing authority) made repeated applications for rehousing on the grounds that his accommodation was unsuitable for his disabilities and was in disrepair. The Ombudsman found extensive maladministration including: (1) systemic failures in approach to the rehousing applications; (2) failure to follow relevant legislation, statutory guidance and policies and procedures; and (3) poor record-keeping. He recommended a wide-ranging re-training of staff, a review of the local housing authority’s policies, systems and procedures, an apology and £1,500 compensation.

• In 2008 a local housing authority had allocated a property to a disabled man which it subsequently said could not be adapted to meet his needs (although it had been fully aware of his needs prior to allocating the property). It advised him to apply for a transfer but he did not wish to move again as his family had become settled. The local housing authority carried out no adaptations for over three years until it reassessed the complainant’s needs following the complaint to the Ombudsman’s office in 2011. It then agreed to carry out all the adaptations requested. The Ombudsman found maladministration in the allocation process and throughout the request for adaptations at the property. There had been no occupational therapist’s (OT) assessment prior to allocation, nor was there a full assessment of the need for adaptations by either an OT or social services for over three years after the complainant had moved in. The local housing authority did not appear to recognise its statutory social care duties to him, or that his human rights may have been engaged. The Ombudsman made a number of recommendations including an apology and payment of £3,000.

• A tenant applied for a transfer in 2004 on the grounds that her accommodation was overcrowded. She complained that the local housing authority had failed to deal with her application properly. On investigation, the Ombudsman found that: (1) for the period from January 2003 to May 2006 the local housing authority had failed to have a lawful allocation scheme; (2) it had failed to visit the accommodation to assess over-crowding; (3) in making its paper assessment of the overcrowding, it had considered only one of the two overcrowding standards in HA 1985, s 326 and had failed to conduct an overcrowding assessment under the Health and Safety Hazards Rating System introduced by Housing Act 2004; (4) it had failed to record receipt of and reply promptly to correspondence; and (5) it had failed to consider whether the accommodation might no longer be ‘reasonable to continue to occupy’: HA 1996, s 175. The Ombudsman recommended an apology, compensation, staff training and a proper assessment of the complainant’s application.

2.120 Sadly, the most common source of dissatisfaction with social housing allocation concerns the length of time that applicants have to wait before being made an offer of accommodation or succeeding in a bidding process in a choice-based letting scheme. Invoking legal remedies, or complaints procedures, rarely cures that grievance where the root cause of it is an excess of demand over supply.

AN OVERVIEW

3.1 The statutory scheme for social housing allocation contained in Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996), Pt 6 has some features which are common to England and Wales and other features which apply differently in the two countries. This chapter first explores one of the common features – a restriction on eligibility for an allocation which is primarily based on immigration status – and then addresses, in turn, two aspects in which the statutory allocation arrangements apply differently:

(1) the ability to exclude applicants from allocation based on criteria of ‘qualification’, available only to local housing authorities in England; and

(2) the ability to exclude applicants on the basis that past misconduct has rendered them ‘ineligible’, now available only to local housing authorities in Wales.

3.1 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

Welsh Code). See Appendix 1 of this book for the English Codes and see the accompanying CD ROM for the Welsh Code.

This was available to local housing authorities in both countries until 18 June 2012. Readers considering the position for local housing authorities in England prior to 18 June 2012 may wish to refer to the text setting out the current position in Wales at 3.151–3.200.

3.2 If an applicant is found to be ‘ineligible’, the local housing authority is statutorily barred from allocating housing accommodation to him or her. Further, only an applicant who is also found to be a ‘qualifying’ person by a local housing authority in England will be allocated housing accommodation by that authority.

1 HA 1996, s 160ZA(1) and (6) (England), s 160A(1) (Wales).

3.3 In relation to eligibility, a local housing authority in England or Wales must decide that people who are subject to immigration control (with limited exceptions), and other people who are to be treated as persons from abroad, are ineligible unless either:

(1) they are currently secure, introductory or, in certain cases, assured tenants of social housing;

(2) they fall within one of the exceptional classes prescribed by regulations as being eligible for allocation notwithstanding their immigration or residence status.

1 HA 1996, ss 159(4B) and 160ZA(5) (England) and 160A(6) (Wales), English Code, para 3.4, Welsh Code, para 2.13(i).

2 HA 1996, s 160ZA(2), (3) and (4) (England), s 160A(3), (4), (5) and (6) (Wales); Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006, SI 2006/1294, regs 3–4 as amended; Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014, SI 2014/263 (W 257), regs 3–4.

3.4 In relation to ‘qualification’, the position is much more flexible. Local housing authorities in England are free to decide for themselves what classes of eligible persons are or are not also qualifying persons. That flexibility is subject to a back-stop in that the Secretary of State can prescribe by regulations that certain classes must be treated as qualifying persons or are not to be so treated. At the date of writing, such regulations had only been made in respect of the treatment of applicants with connections to the armed forces (see 3.128–3.133) and those applicants seeking to move for work-related reasons (see 3.134–3.135).

2 HA 1996, s 160ZA(8).

3.5 In relation to ‘eligibility’ turning on past misconduct, a local housing authority in Wales may choose to adopt and apply a rule that applicants who have been guilty of unacceptable behaviour, serious enough to make them unsuitable to be tenants of the local housing authority, are ineligible for an allocation. This is a discretionary power available to all local housing authorities in Wales but they are not obliged to use it. If a local housing authority does choose to use it, considers an applicant’s behaviour, and concludes that the behaviour is not so serious as to make the applicant unsuitable to be a tenant, but that he or she should be penalised in some way, it could decide that the applicant is eligible for an allocation, but that he or she should receive a lower priority than other applicants³.

1. HA 1996, s 160A(7) and (8); Welsh Code, para 2.30.
2. HA 1996, s 160A(2) and (7); Welsh Code, para 2.29.

3.6 The various categories of ineligibility and qualification are examined in detail in the remainder of this chapter.

3.7 If an applicant is found by a local housing authority to be ineligible or not qualified for an allocation, that decision and the reasons for it must be notified to him or her in writing¹. The applicant is then entitled to request a review of the decision and to be notified of the review decision and the reasons for it². There is no provision for any appeal against the review decision to the county court, so any challenge by legal proceedings could only be by judicial review³.

1. HA 1996, s 160ZA(9) and (10) (England), s 160A(9) and (10) (Wales).
2. HA 1996, s 166A(9)(c) (England), s 167(4A)(d) (Wales).

3.8 If an applicant is ineligible for an allocation of accommodation for any reason, he or she must not be allocated a sole tenancy, nor be allocated a joint tenancy with others, under the allocation scheme⁴. So, if a couple apply for an allocation of a property to be let on a joint tenancy and only one of them is eligible, a joint tenancy cannot be granted. The tenancy can only be granted to the eligible applicant in his or her sole name. In respect of ‘qualification’⁵ the rule is different. While an allocation may not be made to a non-qualifying person as a sole tenant, a joint tenancy may be granted as long as at least one of the joint tenants is a qualifying person (and both are eligible)⁶.

1. HA 1996, s 160ZA(1) (England), s 160A(1) (Wales). However, once a person has been granted a secure or assured tenancy, that tenancy does not come to an end, nor is the landlord entitled to apply for possession, simply because he or she is ineligible for a grant of a secure or assured tenancy. The landlord can only obtain possession under the grounds for possession at Housing Act 1985, Sch 2 (secure tenants) or Housing Act 1988, Sch 2 (assured tenants), or if the tenant loses his or her security of tenure (Akinbolu v Hackney London Borough Council (1997) 29 HLR 259, CA).
2. For local housing authorities in England.
3. HA 1996, s 160ZA(6)(b); English Code, para 3.29.

3.9 The eligibility and qualification restrictions apply to applicants, not to their dependants or others in the household with whom they seek to be accommodated. However, the previous unacceptable behaviour of a household member may allow a local housing authority in Wales to treat the applicant himself or herself as ineligible⁷.

3.10 If an eligible applicant has ineligible or non-qualifying family members, their needs must still be taken into account when the local housing authority considers the type and size of accommodation to be allocated, provided they form part of the applicant’s household⁸. However, a local housing authority is free to take into account the immigration status of family members in deciding whether they do indeed form part of an applicant’s ‘household’. If an ineligible household member is a ‘restricted person’, that fact will not render the otherwise eligible applicant ineligible, but it may affect his or her entitlement to a reasonable preference.

1 R (Kimvono) v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council (2001) 33 HLR 78, Admin Ct.
3 A ‘restricted person’ is a person: who is not eligible for assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7 (as amended by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) or Housing (Wales) Act 2014 (H(W)A) 2014) Pt 2; who is subject to immigration control within the meaning of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996; and either who does not have leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom or whose leave to enter or remain is subject to a ‘no recourse to public funds’ condition. HA 1996, s 184(7) (England); Housing (Wales) Act 2014, s 63(5) (Wales). See 4.148–4.149.
4 HA 1996, s 166A(4) (England), s 167(2ZA) (Wales) and 4.148–4.149.

3.11 Ineligible or non-qualifying applicants are not prevented by HA 1996, Pt 6, from acquiring a tenancy in cases where those provisions do not apply, eg where the grant of a tenancy to them does not count as an allocation at all.

1 HA 1996, s 159(4A)–(5), s 160(2), (3) and (4). See also 1.23–1.27.

INELIGIBILITY ON THE GROUNDS OF IMMIGRATION STATUS
(ENGLAND AND WALES)

Overview

3.12 The provisions governing ineligibility on the basis of immigration status are tortuous and complicated. The Codes of Guidance each have several annexes to help with the assessment of eligibility.

1 English Code, Annexes 2–4 inclusive; Welsh Code, Annexes 4–6 inclusive.

3.13 The immigration status of an existing secure or introductory tenant, or an assured tenant who was nominated to his or her landlord by a local housing authority, who has applied for an allocation (eg by way of a transfer) is irrelevant. Those applicants are eligible for an allocation irrespective of their immigration status.

2 Immigration Act 2014, Pt 2 prohibits certain persons from occupying premises under a residential tenancy agreement on the grounds of their immigration status. However, this does not apply to allocations under HA 1996, Pt 6: Immigration Act 2014, Sch 3, para 1.

3.14 The general rule in HA 1996, Pt 6, is that applicants who are ‘people from abroad’ are not eligible. They fall into two distinct categories:

• those subject to immigration control:
  – they are not eligible for assistance;
Ineligibility on the grounds of immigration status 3.16

- unless they fall within a class prescribed as ‘eligible’ in regulations made by the Secretary of State or the Welsh Ministers;
- those not subject to immigration control but who are nevertheless prescribed by regulations as being ‘persons from abroad’:
  - they are not eligible if they are not habitually resident in the Common Travel Area unless they are prescribed as exempt from the habitual residence test; or
  - they are not eligible if they are prescribed as ineligible because of their particular rights of residence under EU law.

1 HA 1996, s 160ZA(1) (England), s 160A(1)(a) (Wales).
2 HA 1996, s 160ZA(2) (England), s 160A(3) (Wales).

3.15 It can be seen that the Secretary of State and the Welsh Ministers each have the power to make regulations exempting some people from abroad from the exclusory rule. They each also have the power to make regulations excluding people who would otherwise be eligible. Each of these powers has been exercised in both England and Wales.

1 They cannot designate as eligible any person who is excluded from entitlement to housing benefit or universal credit by the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, s 115 (HA 1996, s 160ZA(3) (England), s 160A(4) (Wales)). Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, s 115 prescribes that ‘a person subject to immigration control’ is not eligible for housing benefit or universal credit unless he or she falls within one of the classes of people prescribed by the Secretary of State. Classes of person subject to immigration control who are entitled to housing benefit are prescribed in the Social Security (Immigration and Asylum) Consequential Amendment Regulations 2000, SI 2000/636, reg 2 and Sch 1, Pt 1 and the Housing Benefit Regulations 2006, SI 2006/213, reg 10(3B).
2 This chapter does not deal with the regulations in effect prior to 1 June 2006 (for applications to local housing authorities in England) or 31 October 2014 (for applications to local housing authorities in Wales). Reference can be made to the three previous editions of this book if necessary (Luba and Davies Housing Allocation and Homelessness (1st edn, 2006; 2nd edn, 2010; 3rd edn, 2012).

3.16 For England, the Secretary of State has made the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006, which apply to all applications for an allocation of social housing made to local housing authorities in England on or after 1 June 2006. Those regulations have since been amended by:

- the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2006;
- the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) (Miscellaneous Provisions) Regulations 2006;
- the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) (Amendment No 2) Regulations 2006;
- the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2009;
- the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2012;
- the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2013;

2 These Annexes are not kept up to date and should be read with caution.

3.18 For Wales, the Welsh Ministers made the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014, which apply to all applications to local housing authorities in Wales made on or after 31 October 2014.

2 For the relevant regulations in Wales before 31 October 2014, see Luba and Davies Housing Allocation and Homelessness (1st edn, 2006; 2nd edn, 2010; 3rd edn, 2012).

3.19 The text of the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014 is contained in the CD ROM which accompanies this book. Guidance is provided at paras 2.13(ii)–2.28 and Annexes 4–6 of the Welsh Code.

3.20 There will be applicants whose applications were made before June 2006 (to a local housing authority in England) or before 31 October 2014 (to a local housing authority in Wales). The question of whether or not they were eligible for an allocation fell to be considered under the regulations in effect at the date that they made their applications. However, the English Code advises that authorities consider applicants’ eligibility at the time of the initial application and again when considering making an allocation to them, particularly where a substantial amount of time has elapsed since the original application. This two-stage checking of eligibility will affect applicants:

- who either made their applications before 1 June 2006 and were eligible under one of the classes in the previous regulations but do not fall within any of the classes prescribed as eligible in the current regulations; or
- whose immigration status may have changed since they made their applications.

1 For applications to a local housing authority in England before 1 June 2006, the relevant regulations were the Allocation of Housing (England) Regulations 2002, SI 2002/3264. Those regulations were amended by the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Amendment) (England) Regulations 2006, SI 2006/1093, with effect to applicants whose applications were made between 20 April 2006 and 31 May 2006.

3.21 The regulations in both England and Wales set out classes of persons who are subject to immigration control, but are prescribed as nevertheless eligible. They also set out classes of persons who are not subject to immigration control, but are nevertheless ineligible. Since the coming into force of the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014 on 31 October 2014, the respective classes in England and Wales have been virtually identical. However, the classes prior to 31 October 2014 contained a number of important differences. Readers interested in these historic differences may wish to refer to the previous editions of this book.

2 There are minor semantic differences between SI 2006/1294 (England) and SI 2014/2603 (W 257) (Wales), for example SI 2014/2603 (W 257) is gender neutral, but in substance the law is now identical.

3.22 The rules that tell us whether a person falling within either of the two categories (those subject to immigration control and those not subject to such control) is eligible for assistance need careful examination. The rules that apply to the first category are discussed at 3.31–3.47. The rules that apply to the second category are discussed at 3.48–3.75. But first it is necessary to work out which category an applicant is within. That depends on whether or not the applicant is ‘subject to immigration control’. References will be made, where appropriate, to the fuller commentary on this topic contained in Chapter 11.

1 See 11.26–11.93.

Who is, and is not, subject to immigration control?

3.23 There is a special meaning of ‘subject to immigration control’¹. The HA 1996, s 160ZA(3) (England), s 160A(3) (Wales) refer to:

3.23 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

‘. . . a person subject to immigration control within the meaning of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996.’

1 See 11.26–11.93 for a fuller discussion of who is, and is not, subject to immigration control including a detailed exposition of the various rights of residence available to EEA nationals. What follows is simply an outline.

3.24 The Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 defines ‘a person who is subject to immigration control’ as being a person1:

‘. . . who under the 1971 Act requires leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom (whether or not such leave has been given).’

1 Asylum and Immigration Act 1996, s 13(2).

3.25 Tracing that route back to the Immigration Act 19711 reveals that:

- British citizens;
- Commonwealth citizens with the right of abode in the UK;
- European Economic Area (EEA) and Swiss nationals2 exercising certain Treaty rights3;
- family members and others exercising rights derived from those EEA or Swiss nationals exercising, or who had previously exercised, certain Treaty rights4;
- certain people who are exempt from immigration control under the Immigration Acts (diplomats and their family members based in the UK, and some military personnel); and
- Irish citizens with a Common Travel Area entitlement5;

do not require leave to enter or remain in the UK and therefore cannot be persons ‘subject to immigration control’6. Those applicants will be eligible unless they fall within the second sub-category of persons prescribed as being ‘persons from abroad’ and not eligible7.

2 From 1 June 2002, Swiss nationals have had the same rights to freedom of movement and social security within the EEA as EEA nationals and Swiss nationals now fall within the definition of ‘EEA nationals’ at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, reg 2. All references to EEA nationals in this book therefore include Swiss nationals.
3 Immigration Act 1988, s 7; Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, regs 13–15. For a full discussion of the various rights of residence available to EEA nationals and whether, consequently, an EEA national is, or is not, subject to immigration control, see 11.26–11.93. It is to be expected that the law relating to the rights of EEA nationals to reside in the UK will change significantly following Brexit. What these changes may be and when they may come into effect are, at the time of writing, a matter of speculation. This chapter states the law as in force at the time of writing.
5 In the case of McCarthy v Brent London Borough Council (2016) November Legal Action, p 41, County Court at Central London, the local housing authority unsuccessfully sought to persuade the court that Irish Citizens with a Common Travel Area entitlement were subject to immigration control.

3.27 Box 2 shows which countries are members of the European Union (EU) and/or members of the wider European Economic Area (EEA). Obviously, the list will fluctuate from time to time. For these purposes, nationals of Iceland, Liechtenstein, Norway, and Switzerland have the same rights to enter or reside as nationals of most of the EU Member States⁵. Rights for nationals of Croatia⁶ are slightly different from those enjoyed by nationals of other EEA states⁷. We refer throughout this chapter to nationals of EEA Member States, by which we mean all the EU Member States plus the three additional EEA Member States and Switzerland.

The European Union (EU):
Member States: Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden and the UK; and Accession States acceding in 2013: Croatia

The European Economic Area (EEA):
All EU States plus Iceland, Liechtenstein and Norway.
Switzerland is not part of the EEA, but its nationals are treated as EEA nationals for these purposes.

1 Croatia acceded to the European Union on 1 July 2013. Albania, Montenegro, Serbia, Turkey and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia are candidate countries for accession to the EU. Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Kosovo are potential candidate countries. See www.europa.eu/about-eu/countries/index_en.htm for an up-to-date list.

3 See 11.88–11.92.

4 The nationals of new member states are typically treated differently upon accession to the EU. Rights for nationals of the eight 2004 Accession States (A8 states) were initially subject to derogation between 1 May 2004 and 30 April 2009 (Accession (Immigration and Worker Registration) Regulations 2004, SI 2004/1219). This period was subsequently extended to 30 April 2011 (Accession (Immigration and Worker Registration) (Amendment) Regulations 2009, SI 2009/892). This extension was recently held to be unlawful by the Court of Appeal in Secretary of State for Work and Pensions v Gubeladze [2017] EWCA Civ 1751, CA. The nature and extent of the practical ramifications of this decision remain to be seen. But, in any event, from 1 May 2011 nationals of the A8 member states have been treated in the same way as nationals of any other EEA member state, save that retained worker status is slightly different. The A8 states were the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Slovakia and Slovenia. Rights for nationals of the two 2007 Accession States (A2 states) were subject to derogation between 1 January 2007 and 31 December 2013 (Accession (Immigration and Worker Registration) Regulations 2006, SI 2006/3317). From 1 January 2018 nationals of the A2 member states have been treated in the same way as nationals of any other EEA member state, save that retained worker status is slightly different. The A2 states were Romania and Bulgaria. Rights for Croatian nationals have been subject to derogation since 1 July 2013. After 30 June 2018, Croatian nationals are to be treated in the same way as other EEA nationals. See 11.88–11.92.

6 Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, reg 2.

3.28 If the applicant, even if newly arrived in the UK, does not require leave to enter or remain in the UK, he or she will usually be ‘eligible’ unless rendered ineligible by falling within the second sub-category. For these purposes, it is important to emphasise that a person, usually an EEA national, or a person claiming to exercise rights derived from an EEA national, who does not require leave to enter but who does require leave to remain and does not have it, is a person subject to immigration control. It is only a person who requires neither leave to enter nor leave to remain who is not subject to immigration control. Strangely, a person can be ineligible for an allocation of social housing even if he or she was born in the UK and has never left it, simply because he or she does require leave to enter or remain in the UK and does not have it.

3.29 Everyone else is a ‘person subject to immigration control’ and is not eligible for assistance unless he or she falls into one of the classes prescribed by the Regulations1. In some instances it will be easy to establish whether an individual falls within the list of persons not subject to immigration control at 3.25. For example, it will often be fairly easy to establish whether an individual has British Citizenship, from which it can then be concluded that he or she is not subject to immigration control. Difficulties tend to arise in cases involving EEA nationals. In these cases it is not sufficient to inquire whether the individual has citizenship of a country within the EEA in order to determine whether he or she is subject to immigration control. In addition to that inquiry it will be necessary to establish whether he or she is exercising treaty rights, or has derived a right to reside from another person who is exercising his or her treaty rights. Answering these questions is rarely straightforward. For that reason, a detailed discussion of the various rights to reside available to EEA nationals and their family members can be found at 11.32–11.93.

3.30 The resolution of any uncertainty about an applicant’s immigration or asylum status, or the relevant dates (eg of entry into the UK or application for asylum) may require the help of the Home Office1. Local housing authorities are advised to contact the Home Office if there is any uncertainty arising from an application, and to inform the applicant that an inquiry will be made before doing so2. This allows the applicant an opportunity to withdraw his or her application for if he or she does not want such an inquiry to be made. The Home Office advises on an applicant’s immigration status, but the decision on eligibility is for the local housing authority itself3.

1 The English Code refers to the UKBA, which ceased to exist in 2013. The functions of the UKBA have, for the most part, been subsumed by United Kingdom Visas and Immigration (UKVI): a subsidiary of the Home Office. Contact details can be found at Welsh Code, Annex 5.

Working out whether the applicant is eligible

Sub-category one: those who are subject to immigration control

3.31 Anyone who requires leave to enter or remain in the UK is a person subject to immigration control1 and will not be eligible for an allocation unless he or she falls within one of the classes prescribed as eligible in regulations made by the Secretary of State or the Welsh Ministers¹.
3.31 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

¹ See 3.23–3.30 and 11.26–11.93 for a detailed discussion of who is, and who is not, subject to immigration control.

2 HA 1996, s 160ZA(2) (England), s 160A(3) (Wales).

3.32 The Secretary of State and the Welsh Ministers cannot designate as ‘eligible’ anyone who is excluded from entitlement to housing benefit or universal credit by the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, s 115¹.

3.33 The Secretary of State and the Welsh Ministers have exercised their powers given by HA 1996, s 160ZA(2) (England) and s 160A(3) (Wales) to set out classes of persons subject to immigration control who are nevertheless eligible for an allocation of accommodation.

3.34 The basic rule is that a person subject to immigration control is not eligible. The exceptions to that basic rule are contained in classes set out in regulations. Regulation 3 of the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006¹ and Reg 3 of the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales)¹ Regulations 2014² prescribe that the following classes of people from abroad are eligible even though they are subject to immigration control:

(1) Class A:³ a person recorded by the Secretary of State as a refugee and who has leave to enter or remain in the UK.

(2) Class B: a person who has:
   a) exceptional leave to enter or remain in the UK; and
   b) whose leave is not subject to conditions requiring him or her to maintain and accommodate himself or herself and any dependants without recourse to public funds.

(3) Class C: a person:
   a) who is habitually resident in the ‘common travel area’ (CTA); and
   b) who has current leave to enter or remain in the UK which is not subject to any limitation or condition; but
   c) is not someone who has—
      i) been given leave to enter or remain in the UK upon a written undertaking from a sponsor that he or she will be responsible for maintenance and accommodation; and
      ii) has been resident in the CTA for less than five years beginning on the date of entry or the date of the undertaking (whichever is the later date); and
      iii) whose sponsor is still alive.

(4) Class D: a person who has humanitarian protection granted under the Immigration Rules.
Ineligibility on the grounds of immigration status 3.37

(5) Class E: a relevant Afghan citizen who has been granted leave to enter under Immigration Rules, HC 395, para 276BA1, and who is habitually resident in the CTA.

(6) Class F: A person who has limited leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom on family or private life grounds under Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, such leave granted:
(a) under para 276BE(1), para 276DG or Appendix FM of the Immigration Rules; and
(b) who is not subject to a condition requiring that person to maintain and accommodate himself, and any person dependent upon him, without recourse to public funds.

11 The requirements of SI 2006/1294, reg 3(f), strictly, do not make grammatical sense: a point highlighted in the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments Thirteenth Report of Session 2016–17, 16 November 2016, para 2.4. However, if one avoids an overly technical reading, the scope of the class is clear. This grammatical error has been avoided in SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 5(1)(g).

3.35 Guidance on the Classes is given in the English Code, para 3.11. A number of the Classes contain common terms that are themselves defined by the regulations or by case law. For the meaning of:

- ‘Common Travel Area’ (CTA), see 3.26, Box 1;
- ‘habitually resident’, see 3.55–3.61 and 11.130–11.136;
- ‘UK’, see 3.26, Box 1.

Each class can now be examined in further detail.

CLASS A: REFUGEES

3.36 If a former asylum-seeker is granted refugee status by the Secretary of State, he or she will also have the ‘leave to enter or remain in the UK’ required for Class A purposes and will be eligible for homelessness assistance, welfare benefits, community care services and for an allocation of social housing according to the same criteria as those applicable to British citizens. Leave is usually granted for an initial period of five years with the possibility of applying for indefinite leave thereafter.

3.37 It is not unusual for someone to be granted refugee status and then apply for his or her family to come to the UK. The family enters the UK with the refugee acting as their sponsor\(^1\). A refugee is entitled to such family reunion\(^2\), and so the usual rules regarding maintenance and accommodation (which would normally involve a condition of ‘no recourse to public funds’) do not apply to a refugee’s family members.

\(^1\) See R (Jimaali) v Haringey London Borough Council (2002) November Legal Action, p 24, Admin Ct for discussion of the specific meaning and effect of the word sponsor in this context.

CLASS B: Exceptional leave to enter or remain

3.38 ‘Exceptional leave to enter or remain’\(^1\) was generally a status granted to asylum-seekers whose claim for full refugee status had not succeeded, but where the Home Office recognised that there were compelling humanitarian and/or compassionate circumstances that required that the applicant should be allowed to stay in the UK. From 1 April 2003, the Home Office has called leave granted in those circumstances ‘humanitarian protection’ or ‘discretionary leave’\(^2\). Viewed broadly, anyone who has been granted leave when the Secretary of State has recognised that he or she does not fully meet the requirements of the Immigration Rules has been treated ‘exceptionally’ and may be said to have been granted ‘exceptional leave’.

\(^2\) Letter from the Homelessness Directorate to Chief Executives and Housing Directors of English local housing authorities (ODPM, 25 March 2003). This leave is now only granted very rarely.

3.39 People with exceptional leave to enter or remain will be eligible for an allocation unless that leave is subject to a condition requiring them to maintain and accommodate themselves, and their dependents, without recourse to public funds. The presence or absence of such a condition will be manifest from the document, or stamp, containing the grant of leave.

3.40 Subject to that exception, they will not only be entitled to an allocation of social housing but also to homelessness assistance, welfare benefits and community care services.

3.41 Leave is normally, but not always, granted for three years. If, after the end of that period, the leave is not renewed, the person will no longer be eligible for an allocation, unless he or she falls within one of the other classes. However, once an applicant has been allocated a tenancy of social housing, that tenancy cannot be terminated on the basis that he or she is no longer eligible. The applicant will be entitled to remain in his or her tenancy or to apply for another allocation as an existing secure, introductory or assured tenant\(^1\).

Ineligibility on the grounds of immigration status 3.46

CLASS C: A PERSON WITH CURRENT LEAVE TO ENTER OR REMAIN IN THE UK WITH NO CONDITION OR LIMITATION AND WHO IS HABITUALLY RESIDENT IN THE CTA

3.42 The type of leave contemplated by this class is commonly referred to as ‘indefinite leave to enter or remain’¹ and cannot be granted subject to conditions. Anyone granted indefinite leave will be eligible if he or she is also habitually resident in the CTA¹.

³ For the meaning of ‘habitually resident’ see 3.55–3.61 and 11.130–11.136. For the meaning of ‘CTA’ see 3.26, Box 1.

3.43 If leave to enter or remain was granted on a written undertaking that a sponsor would be responsible for the applicant’s maintenance and accommodation, the applicant will not be eligible under this class for an allocation for the five years running from:

• the date of his or her arrival in the UK, or
• the date the sponsorship undertaking was given,
starting from whichever is the later event.

3.44 After those five years, or during the five years if the sponsor (or at least one of several sponsors) has died, an applicant will be eligible under this class (subject to satisfying the test of habitual residence)¹.

CLASS D: A PERSON GRANTED HUMANITARIAN PROTECTION UNDER THE IMMIGRATION RULES

3.45 ‘Humanitarian protection’¹ is granted to those people whose claims for asylum do not succeed, but who have international protection needs (ie they face a serious risk of the death penalty, unlawful killing, torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment if removed from the UK). The status must be granted pursuant to the Immigration Rules.² People with humanitarian protection are entitled to family reunion in the same way as refugees.³

³ Immigration Rules, HC 395 (23 May 1994 as amended), paras 352FA–352FL.

CLASS E: A RELEVANT AFGHAN CITIZEN GRANTED LEAVE TO ENTER UNDER IMMIGRATION RULES, PARA 276BA1, WHO IS HABITUALLY RESIDENT IN THE CTA

3.46 This class¹ consists of persons habitually resident² in the CTA³ and who have limited leave to enter the United Kingdom as a relevant Afghan citizen under para 276BA1 of the Immigration Rules. This is a niche category of leave offered to locally engaged staff in Afghanistan who worked in particularly challenging or dangerous roles in Helmand province.
3.46 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

4 HC 395 (23 May 1994 as amended).

CLASS F: PERSON WHO HAS LIMITED LEAVE TO ENTER OR REMAIN IN THE UK ON FAMILY OR PRIVATE LIFE GROUNDS UNDER ARTICLE 8, WHO IS NOT SUBJECT TO A NO RECURSE TO PUBLIC FUNDS CONDITION

3.47 To fall within this class a person must:

(a) have limited leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom on family or private life grounds under Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, such leave granted under para 276BE(1), para 276DG or Appendix FM of the Immigration Rules, and

(b) not be subject to a condition requiring that person to maintain and accommodate himself, and any person dependent upon him, without recourse to public funds.

This class was introduced in 2016 in England and 2017 in Wales. In broad terms, the class encompasses those granted leave to remain in the UK pursuant to Art 8. The policy background to this class is described in detail at 11.117–11.121.

2 Immigration Rules, HC 395 (23 May 1994, as amended).
3 See HC 395 (23 May 1994, as amended), strictly, do not make grammatical sense: a point highlighted in the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments Thirteenth Report of Session 2016–17, 16 November 2016 at para 2.4. However, if one refrains from an overly technical reading, the scope of the class is clear and the requirements have been set out here so as to avoid reproducing the error. This grammatical error has been avoided in SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 3(1)(f).
4 SI 2006/1294, reg 3(1)(f) was added by the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/965, in force from 30 October 2016. SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 5(1)(g) was added by the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) (Amendment) Regulations 2017, SI 2017/698 (W 164).

Sub-category two: other ‘persons from abroad’

OVERVIEW

3.48 Ordinarily, persons not subject to immigration control would be eligible for an allocation of social housing. However, the Secretary of State and the Welsh Ministers are permitted to make regulations treating some people who are not subject to immigration control as ‘persons from abroad’ and therefore not eligible for allocation. Both the Secretary of State and the Welsh Ministers have exercised these powers.
Ineligibility on the grounds of immigration status 3.53

1 See 3.23–3.30 and 11.26–11.93 for the rules on how to determine who is, and who is not, subject to immigration control.

3.49 In the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006¹, and the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014², the Secretary of State and the Welsh Ministers have exercised their powers to treat some people who are not subject to immigration control as ‘persons from abroad’³. This means that some British citizens, nationals of EEA Member States, and others who are exempt from immigration control may nevertheless be denied an allocation on the grounds that they are ‘not eligible’. The primary function of these provisions is to confine new allocations of social housing to the ordinary residents of the UK, ie those habitually resident here, and to EEA nationals exercising Treaty rights.

3 For applications made before 1 June 2006 in England and before 31 October 2014 in Wales, see the first and third editions of this book respectively.

3.50 Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006, reg 4, and Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014, reg 4, establish three classes of people who are to be treated as ‘persons from abroad’ and therefore ineligible for an allocation despite not being subject to immigration control.

3.51 The first class comprises persons who are ‘not habitually resident’ in the CTA. But that test of habitual residence is subject to a number of exemptions.

2 See 3.55–3.61.
3 See Box 1 at 3.26.
4 See 3.62–3.65.

3.52 The second class comprises EEA nationals and their family members whose only right to reside in the UK is derived from their status as job-seekers, as family members of job-seekers, from their initial right to reside in the UK for a period not exceeding three months, by having a derivative right to reside in the UK as the primary carer of a British citizen, or by having a right to reside derived from Art 20 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU.

3.53 The third class comprises EEA nationals and their family members whose only right to reside in the rest of the CTA (Channel Islands, Isle of Man or the Republic of Ireland) is derived from their status as job-seekers, as family members of job-seekers, from their initial right to reside in the UK for a period not exceeding three months, by having a derivative right to reside in the CTA as the primary carer of an Irish or British citizen, or by having a right to reside derived from Art 20 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU.
3.53 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

3.54 Each of the three classes will be examined in turn.

THE FIRST CLASS: NOT HABITUALLY RESIDENT

3.55 ‘Habitual residence’ is not a term of reference to someone’s immigration status. A person may be a British citizen, but if he or she is not habitually resident in the CTA, he or she will not be eligible. Nor is the term ‘habitual residence’ defined in either HA 1996, Pt 6 or in the regulations. It is a question of fact for the local housing authority to decide. Happily, there is some guidance in the Codes of Guidance.

2 See Box 1 at 3.26.
3 Unless he or she is exempt from the habitual residence test. See 3.62–3.65.

3.56 A person who is not habitually resident will also not be entitled to non-contributory social security benefits. If the person is receiving one of those social security benefits, it must follow that the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) has determined that he or she is habitually resident. A determination by the DWP is not necessarily binding on a local housing authority but in the interests of good administration and consistent decision-making, such a determination should certainly be taken into account by the local housing authority during the decision-making process and reasons should be given if the local housing authority elects to depart from the determination.

1 A person who has a derivative right of residence contained at SI 2016/1052, reg 16(5) (the ‘Zambrano’ right of residence) is treated as not habitually resident for the purposes of entitlement to income support, jobseeker’s allowance, state pension credit, and housing benefit (SI 2012/2587, in force 8 November 2012) and for Universal Credit (SI 2013/376 reg 9).
3 See R (Clue) v Birmingham City Council [2010] EWCA Civ 460, [2011] 1 WLR 99, CA on the importance of consistent decision making across government departments and local authorities.
4 See 9.111–9.125 on the duty to give reasons.

3.57 There are two aspects required to be present in order to constitute habitual residence:

(1) a settled purpose of establishing residence in one of the territories of the CTA; and
(2) an appreciable period of such residence.

1 For ‘CTA’, see Box 1 at 3.26.
Ineligibility on the grounds of immigration status

3.58 Whether each aspect is satisfied is a question of fact for the local housing authority to decide. The Codes advise that normally, if someone has lived in one of the territories of the CTA for two years continuously prior to his or her application, he or she should be considered to be habitually resident without further inquiry. However, that should not be taken as meaning that a person cannot be habitually resident if he or she has not lived in one of the territories of the CTA for two years. The point is simply that there is little point in a local housing authority wasting resources by making inquiries into whether or not an applicant who came to the UK more than two years ago is habitually resident. In R (Paul-Coker) v Southwark London Borough Council, a number of instances where people had been resident for periods of time that were shorter than two years, but had been sufficient to constitute 'an appreciable period', were cited to the judge. He said: ‘[i]t is therefore clear that what constitutes an appreciable period of time for these purposes will vary from case to case and will depend on the facts of the individual case’. In that particular case the local housing authority was wrong in law to have directed itself that an applicant had to have been resident for six months before she could be considered to be habitually resident.

3.59 Establishing a ‘settled purpose’ will obviously involve consideration of an applicant’s subjective intentions and motivations. Someone in stable employment may be more likely to be able to establish his or her ‘settled purpose’ to be habitually resident than someone in transitory employment, or dependent on benefits. However, local housing authorities must be careful not to give too much weight to an applicant’s lack of finances and not enough weight to other factors such as the applicant’s nationality, ties with the UK, and future intentions.

3.60 What constitutes an ‘appreciable period of residence’ likewise varies according to the circumstances of each individual’s case. If a former British resident returns to the UK after living and working abroad, he or she may be habitually resident from the first day of his or her return. When someone is coming to live in the UK for the first time, there must be an appreciable period of residence before habitual residence is obtained. To determine how long that period of residence should be in any particular case, local housing authorities should consider all the circumstances, including:

- whether the person is seeking to bring any family members to the CTA;
- whether he or she has brought his or her personal property and possessions to the CTA;
- whether he or she has done everything necessary to establish a residence before coming;
- whether he or she has a right of abode; and
3.60 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

- what ‘durable ties’ there are with the CTA.¹

3.61 In R (Paul-Coker) v Southwark London Borough Council² the local housing authority erred in failing to take into account that the applicant had, in fact, been resident for seven months, had given birth to a child who was a British national, had spent her formative years in the UK and had returned for extended holidays in the three years preceding her arrival, that she had travelled to the UK on a one-way ticket and had family and friends in the UK. All of those factors should have been considered.

Exemptions from the habitual residence test

3.62 The following people are eligible for assistance even if they are not habitually resident:

- an EEA national who is a ‘worker’;¹ or
- an EEA national who is self-employed;² or
- until 30 June 2018, a person who is an Accession State national subject to worker authorisation who is authorised in accordance with the Accession Regulations 2013³ (a ‘Croatian national’); or
- a family member of an EEA national who is a worker, a self-employed person, or an Accession State national subject to worker authorisation who is authorised in accordance with the Accession Regulations 2013; or
- a person who has one of certain permanent rights to reside in the UK; or
- a person who is in the UK as a result of having been deported, expelled or otherwise removed by compulsion of law from another country to the UK.

³ Accession of Croatia (Immigration and Worker Authorisation) Regulations 2013, SI 2013/1460.

⁷ SI 2006/1294, reg 4(2)(g); SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 4(2)(f). This group of people who are eligible, even if not habitually resident, is likely to be small.

3.63 Most of these categories refer to those persons exercising rights of freedom of movement enjoyed under EU law, and to the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016¹, which are the current regulations transposing EU freedom of movement legislation into domestic law.

3.64 The penultimate exemption requires some elaboration. This exemption from the habitual residence test only applies to three sub-classes of persons who are entitled to a permanent right of residence. Those three sub-classes give permanent rights of residence to:

1. an EEA national who was a worker or self-employed person who has ceased activity; and
2. the family member of such an EEA national; and
3. a person who was:
   - the family member of an EEA national who was a worker or self-employed person; and
   - the EEA national has died; and
   - the family member had resided with the EEA national immediately before his or her death; and
   - either the EEA national had resided in the UK for at least two years immediately before his or her death; or
   - the death was the result of an accident at work or an occupational disease.

For ‘permanent right of residence’ see 11.61–11.65. For ‘family member’, see 11.54–11.60. For ‘worker’, see 11.40–11.46. For ‘self-employed person’ see 11.47–11.49.

3.65 ‘Worker or self-employed person who has ceased activity’ is defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, reg 5. For ‘family member’, see 11.54–11.60. For ‘worker’, see 11.40–11.46. For ‘self-employed person’ see 11.47–11.49.

The second class: EEA nationals with certain rights to reside in the UK

3.66 Anyone who falls exclusively within this class cannot be eligible for a housing allocation. The habitual residence test is not relevant. If an EEA national is:

(a) a jobseeker; or
(b) a family member of a jobseeker; or
(c) only entitled to remain in the UK by virtue of the initial right to reside for three months; or
(d) has a derivative right to reside because he or she is the primary carer of a British citizen; or
(e) has a right to reside derived from Art 20 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU, where the right to reside arises because a British citizen would otherwise be deprived of the genuine enjoyment of the substance of those rights as an EU citizen, he or she cannot be eligible.

3.67 This second class operates to ensure that any EEA national, or family member of an EEA national, whose only right of residence in the UK is the initial 3-month right of residence is not eligible for an allocation of social housing.

3.68 The second class excludes ‘jobseekers’¹ from an allocation of social housing. EEA nationals who are ‘jobseekers’ are ‘qualified persons’² and therefore are entitled to the extended right of residence. A ‘jobseeker’ is defined as ‘a person who enters the UK in order to seek employment and can provide evidence that he is seeking employment and has a genuine chance of being engaged’⁴. If the jobseeker had previously been employed, he or she may still have retained worker status and so be a ‘worker’ in certain circumstances and therefore potentially eligible⁵.

3.69 Also excluded is any person who is entitled to an EU right of residence that is derived from being the primary carer of a British national⁶. He or she is also to be treated as not habitually resident and thus excluded from receiving non-contributory benefits⁷ including housing benefit. The ‘derivative right of residence’ which forms the basis of this exclusion was recognised by the CJEU in the case of Zambrano v Office national de l’emploi and is now identified in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016⁸. People entitled to any of the four other derivative rights of residence in reg 16 of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016⁹ do not fall within this second class of people excluded from eligibility.

2 Social Security (Habitual Residence) (Amendment) Regulations 2012, SI 2012/2587, and Universal Credit Regulations 2013, SI 2013/376, reg 9. A challenge to these regulations as discriminatory was unsuccessful in R (Sanneh) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2015] EWCA Civ 49, [2015] HLR 27, CA. There is no exclusion prohibiting the person who has this derivative right of residence from working or from receiving contributory benefits. However, if the person is not in or cannot work (not least because of his or her caring
Ineligibility on the grounds of immigration status 3.74

3.70 In addition, a person who has a right derived from Art 20 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU, in a case where the right to reside arises because a British citizen would otherwise be deprived of the genuine enjoyment of the substance of his or her rights as an EU citizen, is also excluded from eligibility. This new provision appears to exclude anyone who has a right of residence which is not, as yet, identified in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations, but which is subsequently declared by the CJEU. Article 20 of the Treaty contains the right of nationals of EU member states to be citizens of the EU and to move and reside freely within the territories of the EU member states. This provision does not exclude all the rights of EU residence that might, in the future, be recognised in CJEU case-law but simply those that are:

- derived from Art 20 of the Treaty; and
- arise because otherwise a British citizen would be deprived of the genuine enjoyment of the substance of his or her rights under EU law.

For rights declared by the CJEU, see 11.93.

3.71 If a person has more than one right of residence, such as being both a job-seeker and being the family member of a worker or self-employed person, then his or her right to reside is not 'only' derived from his or her status as a job-seeker, or from any of the other four provisions in this second class, and he or she will not fall within this second class of persons (not subject to immigration control) who are not eligible.

The third class: EEA nationals with certain rights to reside in the rest of the Common Travel Area

3.72 This third class refers to people who have been residing in the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man or the Republic of Ireland. The rest of the CTA is dealt with by the second class.

3.73 For ‘jobseeker’ see 11.39. For ‘family member’ see 11.54–11.60. For ‘initial right to reside’ see 11.35–11.36. For ‘Common Travel Area’ see 3.26, Box 1. For ‘persons with a right to reside derived from Art 20 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU’, see 11.93.

3.74 The derivative right to reside referred to in this class is the same as that identified in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016.
3.74 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation but is separately identified because those Regulations do not apply to the remainder of the CTA. The derivative right arises as a result of the CJEU’s decision in Zambrano v Office national de l’emploi. That decision recognised rights of residence which are directly effective in the remainder of the CTA: ie the Channel Islands, Isle of Man and the Republic of Ireland. A person will have this derivative right of residence if he or she is the primary carer of a British citizen residing in the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man, or of an Irish citizen, residing in the Republic of Ireland, and the British or Irish citizen would have to leave that country of residence if his or her primary carer did not have an EU right of residence. The derivative right of residence will be enjoyed by people who are not nationals of any EEA member state.

2 C34/09, [2012] QB 265, CJEU.

3.75 As with the second class, if a person has more than one right of residence, then his or her right to reside is not ‘only’ derived from his or her status as a jobseeker, or the other four provisions in this class, and he or she will not fall within this third class of persons (not subject to immigration control) who are not eligible for an allocation of social housing.

QUALIFICATION FOR ALLOCATION (ENGLAND)

Background to the current arrangements

3.76 From 1996 to 2003, each local housing authority in England and Wales had the power to exclude from its statutory housing register whole classes of applicant which it chose to designate as ‘non-qualifying persons’.

1 HA 1996, s 161(4) repealed by Homelessness Act 2002, Sch 2. See 1.16–1.18.

3.77 However, in 2002 the then UK Labour Government expressed concern at the ‘extensive use’ being made of ‘this broad power to effectively exclude categories of applicants from access to social housing, regardless of housing need’. HA 1996, Pt 6, was amended to remove the power to impose blanket exclusions of classes of person. Local housing authorities were left with only a limited power to lawfully exclude individual applicants in narrow circumstances. As a result, from early 2003 to June 2012, a local housing authority in England or Wales only had the ability to treat an applicant as ineligible for allocation as a result of his or her immigration status or because of unacceptable behaviour by the applicant or a member of his or his household.

3 See 3.151 et seq for a description of these arrangements, which still apply in Wales.

3.78 Several of the relatively small number of cases in which the conditions for exclusion were treated by local housing authorities as having been fulfilled led to applications for judicial review. Against that background, local housing authorities often preferred to permit access by all applicants to their allocation schemes but then to use other powers to remove or reduce the preferences.
which certain applicants would otherwise have enjoyed in the local allocation schemes. In consequence, the number of applicants on waiting lists grew steadily from 2003 onwards\(^2\). This led to a further policy change, described in the next few paragraphs, after the election of the UK Coalition Government in 2010.

The policy change

3.79 In its May 2010 programme, the incoming UK Coalition Government proclaimed its intention to ‘promote decentralization’ and ‘end the era of top-down government’ by ‘giving new powers to local councils, communities, neighbourhoods and individuals’\(^1\).

3.80 In the context of social housing allocation, this approach paralleled calls made during 2010 by some local housing authorities in England, and by some housing policy makers, for greater local flexibility in relation to decision-making about access to social housing, and for a move away from the open access needs-based approach to allocation to one more attuned to prioritising local circumstances and local residents\(^2\).

1 See, for example, Allocations and Local Flexibility (Chartered Institute of Housing, February 2010), Allocating social housing: opportunities and challenges (Chartered Institute of Housing, July 2010), and Fairer access to social housing: a consultation proposal (National Housing Federation, August 2010).

3.81 The new Government’s detailed proposals for change to social housing allocation arrangements in England were issued for consultation in November 2010. The published summary stated that under the proposals\(^1\):

‘Councils will be able to set the rules which decide who qualifies to go on the housing waiting list. At the moment they have to keep ‘open’ waiting lists, which means that people can get onto any council’s waiting list whether they need social housing or not.’

1 Local decisions: a fairer future for social housing: A summary (DCLG, November 2010).

3.82 The main consultation paper suggested that in areas where there was not enough housing, ‘continuing to operate an open waiting list raises false expectations and is likely to fuel the belief that the allocation system is unfair’. In addition, it was anticipated that shorter waiting lists would be ‘simpler – and as a result cheaper – to administer’\(^1\). The paper envisaged a return to the pre-2003 position in which local housing authorities in England would once again be able to set their own local criteria for admission to, or exclusion, from their allocation schemes.
3.82 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

1 Local decisions: a fairer future for social housing (DCLG, November 2010).

3.83 Around two-thirds of the local housing authority respondents to the consultation welcomed the proposed flexibility, or indicated that they would consider setting restrictive qualification criteria. In light of that, the proposals were pursued in the form of the Localism Bill.

1 Local decisions: next steps towards a fairer future for social housing – Summary of responses to consultation (DCLG, February 2011), para 4.3.

3.84 During its parliamentary passage, the provisions of the Bill addressing this aspect of social housing allocation received relatively little scrutiny. The Localism Act 2011 achieved Royal Assent in November 2011 and the relevant changes to the allocation provisions of the HA 1996, Pt 6 were brought into force on 18 June 2012.

3.85 Between January and March 2012 the UK Government carried out a consultation exercise on the draft of a new statutory Code of Guidance about social housing allocation for local housing authorities in England. Although more than half of the responses to the consultation considered that the draft guidance on the implementation of the new qualification criteria for allocations was sufficiently clear, ‘a significant minority sought further guidance on framing qualification criteria as they were concerned about the risk of legal challenge’. Despite these requests, the guidance that was eventually published in June 2012 dealt with the new arrangements for ‘qualification’ in only 13 short paragraphs, underscoring the thrust of the UK Government’s policy of leaving it to local housing authorities to decide how best to apply the statutory provisions in their districts.

2 English Code, paras 3.18–3.31.

3.86 In summary, the policy intention behind HA 1996, Pt 6 as amended was to provide local housing authorities in England with the power to decide locally, based on local circumstances, which classes of applicants can or cannot access social housing in their districts. The result is that there may be considerable variation between different local housing authorities as to which ‘classes’ of persons are qualified to apply for social housing or are disqualified. The differences in qualifying classes for allocation schemes, between even neighbouring local housing authorities in England, have created a national patchwork of qualifying criteria.

1 By the Localism Act 2011.

3.87 By 2013, the UK Coalition Government had become concerned that fewer local housing authorities in England than expected had embraced the possibilities offered by the Localism Act 2011 changes. It decided that additional statutory guidance specifically aimed at helping local authorities ‘make full use of their new allocation freedoms’\(^1\) might encourage their take up.

\(^1\) Providing social housing for local people: Strengthening statutory guidance on social housing allocations: A consultation paper (DCLG, October 2013) para 2.

3.88 Following a consultation exercise – which ran for only five weeks and received only 140 responses – on 31 December 2013 the new guidance was issued, in virtually identical terms to the draft\(^1\). The UK Government’s haste was such that the document could not be published, as would be normal, at the same time as the Summary of Responses\(^2\) and the Equality Impact Assessment\(^3\). Those documents were published, much later, in April 2014.

\(^1\) Providing social housing for local people: statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local authorities in England. (DCLG, December 2013).

\(^3\) Providing social housing for local people: statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local authorities in England: Equality statement (DCLG, April 2014).

3.89 A particular function of the December 2013 statutory guidance (referred to in this part of this book as the ‘Supplementary English Code’) was to encourage local housing authorities in England to use the new powers in ways that would ensure that local residents secured the available social housing.

Another was that increased emphasis should be given to meeting the needs of current and former members of the armed forces. In a statement accompanying the issue of his new guidance\(^1\), the Secretary of State said\(^2\):

‘For years hard-working families have watched helplessly as local council homes go to people without jobs or any connection to the local area. We’re calling time on this blatant unfairness. That’s why we’ve published guidance that will ensure local people and members of the Armed Forces are made the top priority for council homes in their community. It’s part of a package of reforms to tackle unsustainable immigration, which will also ensure councils are completely transparent about who they have given social homes to, so those people who make a valuable contribution to their community can be confident they are not losing out.’

\(^1\) Issued under HA 1996, s 169.

3.90 It appears that the policy emphasis in the December 2013 statutory guidance is being reflected in changes to local housing allocation schemes. A survey published in 2016 found that over half of the local housing authority respondents had introduced a local connection requirement. The results from the respondents revealed that since the Localism Act 2011 came into effect, nearly 300,000 people had been removed from waiting lists and a further 43,000 new applicants had been refused entry\(^1\).

3.91 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

The new arrangements

3.91 With effect from 18 June 2012, the Localism Act 2011 amended HA 1996, Pt 6, so as to:

(1) restore to local housing authorities in England the power that they enjoyed between 1996 and 2003, as described at 1.16–1.18 and 3.76, to exclude applicants ‘by class’; and

(2) add a new power for local housing authorities in England to positively prescribe, by class, the only applicants entitled to be allocated social housing under their allocation schemes.\(^1\)

\(^{1}\) Localism Act 2011, s 146, inserting HA 1996, s 160ZA.

3.92 A local housing authority in England can now regulate access to social housing in its district by exercising the power to identify ‘classes’ of persons who are – and/or who are not – qualifying persons for allocation of such housing.\(^1\)

\(^{1}\) HA 1996, s 160ZA(7).

3.93 The only statutory limit on the exercise of these powers by a local housing authority is that they cannot be used to treat as qualifying persons those who are rendered ineligible by their immigration status.\(^1\) The scope for the adoption of very restrictive qualifying classes, or designation of very broad non-qualifying classes, is obvious. As a potential restraint on any abuse of these new powers, the Secretary of State has retained a regulation-making power to:

(1) prescribe classes of persons who are or are not to be treated as qualifying; and

(2) prescribe criteria which cannot be used by local housing authorities to decide which classes of persons are not qualifying persons.\(^2\)

\(^{2}\) HA 1996, s 160ZA(8).

3.94 The former power has yet to be used but the latter power has been exercised in respect of applicants who are, or are related to, current or former armed services personnel (see 3.128–3.133) and for the benefit of applicants for social housing accommodation who were seeking to move for work-related reasons (see 3.134–3.135).

3.95 During the parliamentary passage of the Localism Bill, concern was expressed about the scope of the regulation-making powers and an amendment was moved designed to impose on the Secretary of State a requirement to consult with local housing authorities, over a minimum 12-week period, before exercising the power.\(^1\) The Minister opposed the amendment on the basis that it simply reflected ‘good administrative practice’ which was already observed by the UK Government. He also declined to give examples of the ‘type of scenario’ in which the powers might be used on the (incorrect) basis that the precise powers already existed and were simply being re-enacted.\(^2\)
Qualification for allocation (England) 3.99

Government had previously indicated that the powers would be used if ‘there is evidence that people in housing need are being excluded from social housing without good cause’.

Amending the schemes

3.96 Many local housing authorities in England needed to amend or re-cast their allocation schemes to reflect their policy choices about the exercise of these new powers. If the local housing authority was also a registered social landlord it needed to comply with the statutory regulator’s requirement to ‘clearly set out, and be able to give reasons for, the criteria it uses for excluding actual and potential tenants from consideration for allocations’.

1 For the process of amending an allocation scheme see Chapter 4.
2 Tenancy Standard (Homes and Communities Agency, April 2012), part of The regulatory framework for social housing in England from April 2015 (Homes and Communities Agency, March 2015). See 1.31–1.35.

3.97 The UK Government made some projections of the likely cost of the exercise of reviewing and revising local allocation schemes in the light of these changes:

‘All 326 local authorities are expected to incur a one-off cost from familiarising themselves with the new arrangements, at a cost of between £290,000 in the advantageous scenario and £1.2m in the disadvantageous scenario (central case £770,000).

Those authorities that decide to adapt their policies and procedures will also face costs; these could amount to as little as £400,000 or as much as £3.7m, depending on how many local authorities adapt their waiting list policies and how much staff time is involved.’

3.98 The projection was that these costs would normally be offset, for those local housing authorities choosing to exercise their discretion to limit waiting lists, by the saved costs of receiving and processing applications which have no prospect of securing an allocation.

3.99 The Secretary of State’s view was that the adoption of qualifying criteria would form ‘part of an allocation scheme’ as distinct from forming part of some pre-scheme policy or procedure. If that is correct, identifying in the allocation scheme the classes who qualify and/or those who do not qualify will be highly likely to amount to a ‘major change of policy’ to any current allocation scheme. Such a change triggers an obligation to consult housing associations and other private registered providers in the local housing authority’s district with which it has nomination arrangements.

1 English Code, para 4.1.
2 HA 1996, s 166A(13). See 4.13 et seq.
3.100 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

3.100 No transitional provisions were made, when the new arrangements were brought into force, to deal with the situation of those persons who had already successfully made applications to join local allocation schemes before 18 June 2012. In the absence of any such provision, each local housing authority in England that decides to revise its allocation scheme to incorporate qualifying and/or non-qualifying classes will need to spell out whether those classes will be applied only to new applicants or to all applications.\(^1\)

\(^1\) See 4.20–4.21.

3.101 Sadly, the adoption and exercise of these new powers has not gone as smoothly as might have been hoped. They have triggered a surge in complaints to the Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman who has recorded that: ‘A significant proportion of these are from applicants who have been denied access to their council’s housing register as a result of the new qualification requirements introduced to allocation schemes. In many cases we have found councils at fault in the way they have implemented these changes.’\(^1\)

\(^1\) Full house: Councils’ role in allocating social housing – Focus report: learning lessons from complaints (LGO, January 2016).

Setting the classes

3.102 Defining with precision the classes who qualify or do not qualify for social housing allocation will require very careful consideration. The objective will be to produce terminology which is clear, fair and transparent (so that applicants can easily see precisely what classes the local housing authority has adopted) and also be readily applicable with certainty and assurance by local housing authority officers and staff. So, for example, if a non-qualifying class is drawn to exclude former tenants who lost their tenancies as a result of misconduct, that wording alone will not disqualify the partner of such a former tenant.\(^1\)

\(^1\) Pirie v City of Aberdeen District Council [1993] SLT 1155, Court of Session (Outer House).

3.103 Two specific points will, for practical reasons, need to be addressed:

(1) whether the description of the class should have a built-in override enabling a designated officer to waive the requirements in particular or exceptional cases; and/or

(2) whether the description of the class should apply to all allocations or should be limited by reference to either (a) some types of applicants and/or (b) particular parts of the housing stock.

As to the first of these points, the possible requirement for an overriding discretion is discussed in Chapter 4.\(^1\)

\(^1\) See 4.248–4.257.

3.104 As to the second of these points, the statutory guidance advises that local housing authorities may wish to set different qualifying and non-qualifying classes as between:

(a) new applicants and transferring tenants; and/or
Qualification for allocation (England) 3.108

(b) different types of housing stock (for example, in relation to hard to let housing)\(^1\).

3.105 For example, in relation to qualifying classes drawn by reference to residence (see 3.118–3.121), the Supplementary English Code issued in December 2013 suggests that:

1. they may be defined differently as between current social housing tenants and new applicants for social housing;
2. they might be waived for current tenants who are down-sizing; and
3. they might not be applied to hard-to-let stock\(^1\).

\(^1\) Supplementary English Code (DCLG, December 2013), para 20.

Other legal considerations

3.106 In taking the policy decisions about the parameters of qualifying and non-qualifying classes, local housing authorities will need to take account of their general equality duties under the Equality Act 2010\(^2\), the impact that any fixed residence requirements may have on the free movement of EU workers\(^3\), and the importance of avoiding provisions which may be directly or indirectly discriminatory\(^4\). However, beyond stating those obvious propositions, the main 2012 statutory guidance provides no further assistance\(^4\).

3.107 Each local housing authority in England, when modifying an allocation scheme to introduce new qualifying and non-qualifying classes, must also take account of any relevant content of\(^1\):

(a) its current homelessness strategy adopted under Homelessness Act 2002, s 1\(^2\);
(b) its current tenancy strategy adopted under Localism Act 2011, s 150; and
(c) in the case of a local housing authority that is a London borough council, the London Housing Strategy.

3.108 Once the policy decisions on the new classes have been taken, the consultation has been completed, the final wording has been adopted and the new allocation scheme has been published, it will fall to officers of local housing authorities in England to apply the new qualifying and non-qualifying classes to applicants for social housing allocation.
3.109 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

Guidance on the Equality Act 2010 and qualifying classes

3.109 The Supplementary English Code issued in December 2013, which deals directly with the introduction of qualifying classes, simply states that:

‘16. Whatever qualification criteria for social housing authorities adopt, they will need to have regard to their duties under the Equality Act 2010, as well as their duties under other relevant legislation such as s 225 of the Housing Act 2004.’

1 Supplementary English Code (DCLG, December 2013), para 16.

2 Housing Act 2004, s 225 was repealed as of 12 July 2016 by Housing and Planning Act 2016, s 124. In its place, Housing Act 1985, s 8 was amended to make clear that the existing duty on local housing authorities to review housing needs in their districts included an obligation to consider the needs of people living in caravans or houseboats.

3.110 That guidance followed a consultation exercise in which ‘a few respondents queried the potential for a residency test to indirectly discriminate against certain groups of applicants, such as gypsies and travellers’. The UK Government’s response was that the Supplementary English Code ‘makes clear that local authorities should consider providing for appropriate exceptions to the residency requirement, to take account of special circumstances. It also reminds local authorities of the need to have regard to equalities and other relevant legislation when framing their local residency criteria’.

2 Providing social housing for local people Statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local authorities in England Summary of responses to Consultation (DCLG, April 2014) at para 12.

3.111 The Local Government Association has identified that ‘changes to housing allocation plans that have the net effect of negatively impacting on those with protected characteristics, such as disability race or age, may well be against equality laws, and would be subject to legal challenge’ and has encouraged local housing authorities to cross-check their arrangements against its Social Housing Equality Framework.

1 Councils must consider equality laws when changing services (LGA Media Release, 16 February 2012); Social Housing Equality Framework (LGA, 2012).

3.112 The Chartered Institute of Housing (CIH) has advised that ‘establishing criteria for people to be able to go onto the housing waiting list is not without risk of legal challenge and so housing authorities will need to be mindful of unlawfully discriminating, either directly or indirectly’ and that ‘full consideration of provisions in the Equality Act 2010 and a comprehensive equality analysis will be required to ensure a fair and accessible approach to allocations’. In more recent guidance the CIH has added that local housing authorities should ‘consider, for example the impact [of] policies which treat applicants who are in work and those on benefits differently; such as allowing or not allowing applicants to be allocated a property they are under occupying based on their employment status. Policies like this adversely impact upon people on benefits and could therefore be open to challenge. You should also assess the impact the introduction of a residency test as a qualification criterion may have on different protected groups. Through our research we have come across authorities who have introduced residency tests of up to ten years; consider the negative impact this policy will have on migrants from the European Union, for example:\footnote{Allocation of accommodation: guidance for local authorities in England: Briefing paper (CIH, July 2012), p 7.}

3.113 That last point is echoed in the Equality Statement on the Supplementary English Code. It states that:\footnote{New approaches to allocations (CIH, June 2014), p 12.}

‘How the guidance affects lettings to different ethnic groups and nationalities will depend on how authorities respond to the guidance, as well as the supply, demand and need for social housing in each area: for instance, impacts are likely to vary between larger, urban areas where there is likely to be a more ethnically diverse population, and small, rural communities.

There are likely to be some impacts in relation to recently arrived migrants unless they fall within the exceptions which local authorities adopt to take account of special circumstances. Otherwise, impacts in relation to race and ethnicity are likely to be highly area specific and for local authorities to consider and mitigate, in relation to their equality duties.’

\footnote{Providing social housing for local people: statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local authorities in England: Equality statement (DCLG, April 2014).}

Equality Act 2010 and qualifying classes in the courts

3.114 An example of unlawful qualifying criteria is found in \textit{R (HA) v Ealing London Borough Council}. The local housing authority’s allocation scheme disqualified applicants that had not been resident in the borough for the last five years\footnote{[2015] EWHC 2375 (Admin), [2016] PTSR 16, Admin Ct.}. This was challenged by an applicant who had recently fled to the borough with her children to escape domestic violence. The residency requirement was held to be unlawful for a number of reasons, including that it indirectly discriminated against female victims of domestic violence and no rational justification for the discrimination had been advanced.

3.115 In contrast, a scheme which disqualified applicants who had been ‘guilty of unacceptable behaviour which makes them unsuitable to be a tenant’ was lawful, despite the fact that it discriminated against care leavers. The discrimination was found to be justified as excluding those with behaviours that would have an adverse impact on others being allocated housing would ‘improve the environment for relevant residents in general’ as well as reduce ‘the risk of the defendant expending limited resources on legal proceedings’ to evict such persons1.

Common classes

3.116 In line with its generally non-prescriptive approach to the new powers, the statutory guidance issued by the Secretary of State does not offer any suggested list of qualifying or non-qualifying classes from which local housing authorities may wish to select1.

1 'We have decided to maintain a light-touch approach, in the spirit of localism, and in order to maximise the opportunities for local authorities to innovate and to think creatively about how social housing can best be used to improve people’s lives.' Allocation of accommodation: guidance for local housing authorities in England: Summary of responses to consultation (DCLG, June 2012), para 4.2.

3.117 The only class directly addressed in the 2012 guidance is that of current homeowners. The guidance encourages local housing authorities to avoid allocation of social housing to applicants in that class and suggests that the rule should only be departed from in exceptional circumstances eg where an elderly homeowner needs to move into sheltered social housing accommodation1.

1 English Code, para 3.23. In contrast the Welsh Code advises that local housing authorities are ‘expected to consider the housing needs of owner-occupiers in the same way as other applicants’, para 2.69.

3.118 The Supplementary English Code issued in December 2013 expressly invites all local housing authorities in England to consider framing qualifying or non-qualifying classes by reference to residence criteria. It states that the Secretary of State ‘believes that including a residency requirement is appropriate and strongly encourages all housing authorities to adopt such an approach’1.

1 Supplementary English Code (DCLG, December 2013), para 12.

3.119 Admission to such a qualifying class might require a minimum period of residence in an area (or alternatively a non-qualifying class could exclude those with less than a minimum period of residence). The Supplementary English Code suggests that a reasonable minimum period of residency would be two years1 but local housing authorities have often gone beyond this, with at least one authority’s scheme requiring continuous residency of seven years2.

1 Supplementary English Code (DCLG, December 2013), para 12.
2 House of Commons Library, Allocating social housing (England), Briefing Paper 06397, 9 June 2017.

3.120 The statutory guidance suggests that where local housing authorities do set residency criteria they may wish to consider at least four exceptional categories to be exempted from the normal residency requirements. They are:
Qualification for allocation (England) 3.123

(1) people who are moving into the district to take up work or escape violence;
(2) people who have been placed temporarily outside the local housing authority’s district but are children in the care of that authority or are applicants for homelessness assistance and therefore need to return to the local housing authority’s own district;
(3) people who are existing tenants of social housing seeking to move to a smaller home or to take up a work opportunity; or
(4) people connected with the armed forces (see 3.128–3.133).

1 English Code, para 3.22 and Supplementary English Code (DCLG, December 2013), paras 19 and 22.
2 English Code, para 3.22 and Supplementary English Code (DCLG, December 2013), para 22.
4 Supplementary English Code (DCLG, December 2013), para 25. In October 2017, the Government consulted on proposals to issue new guidance which would ‘strongly encourage’ local authorities to exempt from their residency requirements victims of domestic abuse who have escaped violence from another area and are currently living in refuges in their area’ (Improving Access to Social Housing for Victims of Domestic Abuse: Consultation (DCLG, October 2017).

3.121 Additionally, the Supplementary English Code issued in December 2013 states that ‘When adopting a residency test, we expect housing authorities to also consider the wider needs of the Armed Forces community, and to be sympathetic to changing family circumstances, recognising, for example, that the spouses and partners of Service personnel can also be disadvantaged by the need to move from base to base.’ This guidance became necessary when it was realised that regulations designed to protect the armed forces community from the effects of the introduction of qualifying classes defined by local connection (see 3.128–3.133) would not impact upon qualifying classes drawn by simple reference to residency requirements.

2 This is because local connection and residency are not coterminous. Local connection may be acquired on the basis of normal residence, but the residence must be voluntary and of a quality sufficient to give rise to a local connection. Local connection may also be acquired by other means such as employment: HA 1996, s 199, as amended by HRA 2017, s 8, for applications made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 14.43–14.122.

3.122 Some local housing authorities in England might be attracted to the possibility of framing their qualifying or non-qualifying classes by reference to criteria which already have statutory definitions and well developed case-law such as:

- ‘local connection’;
- ‘reasonable preference’; and
- ‘priority need’.

1 HA 1996, s 199(1) and see 4.27–4.112.
2 HA 1996, s 166A(3) (England) and s 167(2) (Wales), see 4.28–4.114.
3 HA 1996, s 189 and see Chapter 12.

3.123 Local housing authorities could specify that those terms, when used in their allocation schemes, have the same meanings as those used in HA 1996, Pts 6 and 7.
3.124 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

3.124 Others may wish to define, supplement or limit qualifying and non-qualifying classes by reference to other criteria such as:

- age;
- (participation in) anti-social behaviour;
- community involvement/participation;
- employment in the local area;¹
- family associations with an area;²
- housing need (e.g., homeless households and overcrowded families);³
- means (e.g., excluding those with sufficient financial resources to rent or buy privately);⁴
- local residence (see 3.1318–3.121); or
- previous tenant history (e.g., rent arrears).

² Referred to in the Supplementary English Code (DCLG, December 2013), para 15.
³ This example is given in Local decisions: a fairer future for social housing: Consultation (DCLG, November 2010), para 4.9.

3.125 Local housing authorities would need to define in their allocation schemes what these criteria mean and how decisions about them will be taken. One commentator has suggested that making ‘housing need’ a requirement for qualification could have the adverse effects of (1) generating a large number of reviews of decisions that applicants do not fall within a ‘need’ category and (2) making it difficult to give those owed a homelessness duty a ‘reasonable preference’ if their immediate housing need has been met by the provision of suitable temporary accommodation.

3.126 The last of the criteria listed above, previous tenant history, has been taken up with enthusiasm by several local housing authorities which have adopted classes of non-qualifying applicants by reference to their housing-related debts.¹ A survey of 50 allocation schemes found that after ‘local connection’ the three next most common qualification criterion adopted were: (1) making false or misleading statements to obtain a tenancy; (2) owning a home; and (3) exceeding capital or income threshold limits.²

3.127 As already noted (at 3.4), HA 1996, Pt 6 contains reserve powers enabling the Secretary of State to protect certain classes from the full rigour of the freedom of local housing authorities to set their own qualifying criteria. To date, two classes of applicant have been singled out for special treatment. These are (1) applicants who have a particular connection with the armed forces and (2) those who are seeking to move within the social housing stock for work related reasons.
Applicants with a connection to the armed forces

3.128 From the outset of its policy programme to enable local housing authorities in England to set local qualifying and non-qualifying classes of applicants, the 2010–15 UK Coalition Government was keen to ensure that no disadvantage would be suffered by members of the armed forces and their families who were seeking to access social housing¹. However, in responses to the consultation about the scope of the changes, it became clear that some local housing authorities would be introducing quite restrictive qualifying and non-qualifying categories which might exclude ex-services personnel. The Secretary of State has therefore used his regulation-making power² to make regulations³ which prescribe that when deciding which classes of persons are not qualifying persons a local housing authority cannot use the criterion that a person must have a local connection to the district of a local housing authority, if that category applies to a person who is a ‘relevant person’⁴.

3.129 The Regulations came into force on 24 August 2012¹. They give effect to the UK Government’s commitment that those who serve in the regular and reserve armed forces are not disadvantaged in their access to social housing by the requirements of their service².

3.130 For the purposes of the regulations the following are ‘relevant’ persons:

(a) members of the armed forces and former service personnel, where the application for social housing is made within five years of discharge; and

(b) bereaved spouses and civil partners of members of the armed forces leaving services family accommodation following the death of their spouse or partner where that death was wholly or partly attributable to military service; and

(c) serving or former members of the reserve forces who need to move because of a serious injury, medical condition or disability wholly or partly attributable to their service¹.

¹ Regulation 3(3) and English Code, para 3.27. The reserve forces consist of the Royal Fleet Reserve, the Royal Naval Reserve, the Royal Marines Reserve, the Army Reserve, the Territorial Army, the Royal Air Force Reserve, and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force (Armed Forces Act 2006, s 374).

3.131 The intention is to recognise the special position of:
3.131 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

(1) members of the armed forces (and their families) whose employment requires them to be mobile and who are likely therefore to be particularly disadvantaged by local connection requirements; and

(2) those injured reservists who may need to move to another local housing authority district to access treatment, care or support.

1. English Code, para 3.28.

3.132 The UK Government had initially been inclined simply to provide for an armed forces exception to any ‘residence’ requirements that might be used to frame non-qualifying classes. However, when it became clear from consultation responses that some local housing authorities might additionally or alternatively require an employment or family membership connection to a district as an aspect of qualification for an allocation, the UK Government decided to broaden the reach of its draft regulations so as to give exemption from any qualifying rules based on ‘local connection’ as a criterion. The regulations use the same definition of local connection as that used elsewhere in housing legislation.

2. Regulation 3 and HA 1996, s 199, as amended by HRA 2017, s 8, for applications made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 14.43–14.103.

3.133 The net effect is that, in practical terms, if a local housing authority elects to use ‘local connection’ as a criterion for qualifying persons under its local allocation arrangements, it cannot adopt the same approach in relation to armed forces personnel and the other related categories of ‘relevant’ persons. Those persons cannot be excluded from being ‘qualifying persons’ due to the absence of a local connection (although they may, of course, fail to qualify under qualifying classes framed by some other criteria, even a simple residency criteria (see 3.118–3.121)).

1. This is because local connection and residency are not coterminous. See 3.122 fn 1 and 14.43–14.122.

Need to move on work-related grounds

3.134 The Government also decided to make provision for special treatment of current social housing tenants who wished to move for work-related reasons. From 20 April 2015 new regulations provided that local housing authorities must not disqualify specified applicants on the grounds that they do not have a local connection with the authority’s district. As the accompanying statutory guidance explains, local connection may not be applied to existing social tenants seeking to transfer from another local authority district in England who:

- have reasonable preference under s 166(3)(e) because of a need to move to the local housing authority’s district to avoid hardship; and
- need to move because the tenant works in the district; or
- need to move to take up an offer of work.

The policy objective is to ensure that existing social housing tenants who are seeking to move between local authority areas in England in order to be closer to their work, or to take up an offer of work will not be disadvantaged by local qualifying criteria based on residence conditions or other requirements for a ‘local connection’. The policy was adopted following a consultation exercise about a ‘right to move’ which ran from September 2014 to early 2015¹.

² Right to Move: Statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local housing authorities in England (March 2015, Department for Communities and Local Government) reproduced in Appendix 1.

³ Right to Move: Response to Consultation (March 2015, Department for Communities and Local Government).

3.135 In October 2017, the Government stated its view that people who had fled to another area to escape domestic abuse should also be exempt from residency requirements¹. It announced proposals to achieve this, not by regulations, but by issuing new guidance which would ‘strongly [encourage] local authorities to exempt from their residency requirements victims of domestic abuse who have escaped violence from another area and are currently living in refuges in their area’². The consultation on these proposals closed on 5 January 2018. At the time of writing, the Government response had not been published.

Qualification and reasonable preference

3.136 The text of the amended statutory scheme in HA 1996, Pt 6, does not make clear whether a local housing authority in England may specify a class of non-qualifying persons which includes (and therefore disqualifies from allocation) a person – or class of persons - who would otherwise fall within one of the categories¹ required to be given a reasonable preference in the local allocation scheme. What follows in this subsection is a discussion about the legality of qualifying classes judged against the obligation under HA 1996, Pt 6 to give reasonable preference to certain classes of person².

3.137 The 2010–15 UK Coalition Government had seemingly intended that the June 2012 changes in the statutory regime should not lead to those in the reasonable preference categories losing out:

‘It is important that those who are vulnerable and in housing need do not lose out under these changes and that they continue to be in the frame for social housing, together with appropriate support as necessary . . . This applies not just to victims of domestic violence forced to flee their home, or members of the Armed Forces who have to leave their married quarters, but also to those leaving prison with no family to return to. We believe that the statutory duty on local authorities to frame their allocation scheme to give ‘reasonable preference’ to certain groups, together with local authorities’ wider equalities duties, should serve to ensure that local authorities put in place allocation systems which are fair and that those who are vulnerable and in housing need are properly protected.\(^1\)

\(^1\) Local decisions: a fairer future for social housing: Consultation (DCLG, November 2010), para 4.11.

3.138 The Government’s approach was that somehow a balance must be struck between, on the one hand, the exercise of the power to use non-qualification to exclude whole classes of applicants and, on the other, the need to give certain groups of applicants a reasonable preference:

‘We want to provide local authorities with the power to decide who should qualify to be considered for social housing, while retaining a role for government in determining which groups should have priority for social housing through the statutory reasonable preference requirements . . . ’\(^2\)

If a person does not ‘qualify’ for an allocation it is difficult to understand how they can be expected to be given a ‘reasonable preference’ in an allocation scheme. Despite this, on the literal wording of HA 1996, Pt 6, there is the clear potential for local housing authorities to adopt classes which exclude even those applicants who, if they were permitted to join the allocation scheme, would be entitled to a statutory ‘reasonable preference’.

3.139 In light of this confusion it was virtually inevitable that there would be an early legal challenge brought by an applicant who had been told that he or she fell within a non-qualifying class but would otherwise have been given a reasonable preference under a local allocation scheme.

3.140 In \(R\) (Jakimaviciute) v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council\(^1\) the council’s social housing allocation scheme contained a non-qualifying class comprising homeless applicants whom the council had provided with suitable temporary accommodation under its homelessness functions (HA 1996, Pt 7).\(^2\) The claimant fell into that class. As a result she would normally have been entitled to a statutory ‘reasonable preference’ in any allocation scheme (see 4.67–4.79) but the council notified her that she did not qualify for its scheme at all. She sought a judicial review, contending that it was unlawful to exclude from an allocation scheme a person who would otherwise have been given a reasonable preference under a local allocation scheme.

3.140 In \(R\) (Jakimaviciute) v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council\(^1\) the council’s social housing allocation scheme contained a non-qualifying class comprising homeless applicants whom the council had provided with suitable temporary accommodation under its homelessness functions (HA 1996, Pt 7).\(^2\) The claimant fell into that class. As a result she would normally have been entitled to a statutory ‘reasonable preference’ in any allocation scheme (see 4.67–4.79) but the council notified her that she did not qualify for its scheme at all. She sought a judicial review, contending that it was unlawful to exclude from an allocation scheme a person who would otherwise be entitled to a reasonable preference. In the Administrative Court, she was refused permission to seek a judicial review on the grounds that the case was ‘unarguable’\(^3\). The Court of Appeal granted permission to appeal and permission to seek a judicial review. It heard and decided the judicial review claim for itself. It held that the council’s qualifying class had been specifically drawn to disqualify a sub-set of a category of applicants whom HA 1996, Pt 6, had required be given a reasonable preference. That was unlawful. The court appeared to accept that, on the other hand, it was not unlawful to devise a ‘rule excluding individual applicants by reference to factors of general application, such as lack of local connection or being in rent arrears’\(^4\).

Qualification for allocation (England) 3.143

2 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See Chapter 16.

4 [2014] EWCA Civ 1438, CA at [45].

3.141 In R (Aleini) v Westminster City Council1 the council decided not to set a qualifying class disqualifying applicants who were entitled to a reasonable preference by virtue of being owed a homelessness duty but to achieve the same effect by a provision preventing them from bidding under its choice-based letting scheme for one year. It introduced an amended scheme to achieve that effect. The Administrative Court quashed those parts of the amended scheme.

The judge said at para [32]:

‘This amended Scheme carves out a whole sub-group which is altogether excluded from the potential of being allocated social housing for 12 months. They have no preference. Part VI of the Act does not permit the removal of a whole sub-group from a group which section 166A(3) requires be given reasonable preference in the allocation of social housing, when that sub-group is not defined by reference to differentiating features related to the allocation of housing, but applies a simple time bar to all who otherwise qualify. It is unlawful.’

3.142 Much the same approach was followed in R(HA) v Ealing London Borough Council2. In that case, the applicant was owed the main housing duty as an unintentionally homeless person in priority need: HA 1996, s 193(2)2. Her online application for social housing allocation was met with an automated rejection because she could not meet the qualifying criteria that the local housing authority had adopted: ‘Households will not be able to register for housing in future unless they are able to demonstrate that they have been resident in the borough for five years’. The Administrative Court declared the allocation scheme unlawful. The judge said at [23]:

‘Although a residency requirement is an entirely appropriate and encouraged provision in relation to admission onto a social housing list, it must not preclude the class of people who fulfil the “reasonable preference” criteria. The Defendant’s policy does not provide for the giving of reasonable preference to prescribed categories of persons as required by section 166A(3) of the Act. In this respect the policy is unlawful.’

2 See 16.94–16.199.

3.143 A different conclusion was reached in R (Woolfe) v Islington London Borough Council3. As in R (HA) v Ealing, the applicant was owed the main housing duty as an unintentionally homeless person in priority need: HA 1996, s 193(2)2. She was admitted onto the local housing authority’s waiting list but was unable to bid because she had only been awarded 110 points and the local housing authority operated a points threshold pursuant to which applicants with fewer than 120 points were not allowed to bid.

3.143 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

The argument that this threshold was unlawful because it meant that she was not given a reasonable preference was rejected. The Administrative Court distinguished R (Jakimaviciute) v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council, R (Alemi) v Westminster City Council, and R (HA) v Ealing London Borough Council on the basis that, in R (Jakimaviciute) v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council and R (HA) v Ealing London Borough Council, the applicants had been excluded altogether from the register, and in R (Alemi) v Westminster City Council the applicant had been barred from bidding for 12 months regardless of the strength of her case. In contrast, Ms Woolfe had been allowed onto the scheme and had been allocated points, including points for her homelessness, so ‘the scheme does make some preference for her homelessness’ and the court would not ‘subvert the policy and decision of the housing authority as to the number of points to be awarded’. This reasoning suggests that there is a key distinction to be drawn between being given reduced preference and no preference at all. Reduced priority and no priority are conceptually different, even though for the applicant, the practical result may be the same, in that either way he or she has little prospect of being allocated social housing.

In R (Jakimaviciute) v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council, R (Alemi) v Westminster City Council, R (HA) v Ealing London Borough Council, and R (Woolfe) v Islington London Borough Council, the disadvantage facing the claimants arose not from any default on their part but because of their membership (or non-membership) of a particular group. A case in which the applicant’s own conduct made him liable to exclusion from the scheme is the pre-HA 1996, Pt 6, case of R v Wolverhampton Metropolitan Borough Council ex p Watters which was considered by the court in the case of R (Woolfe) v Islington London Borough Council. In R v Wolverhampton Metropolitan Borough Council ex p Watters, the claimant was in a category of persons entitled to reasonable preference, but she had accrued rent arrears which meant that, under the council’s policy, she would not be admitted onto their waiting list. The Administrative Court in R (Woolfe) v Islington London Borough Council noted that:

‘Watters clearly establishes that “other factors” may diminish or “even nullify the preference” after applying a balancing exercise, provided the applicant is first given a “reasonable head start”. In my view, however, there is a material distinction from the facts of the present case. In Watters, there were factors adverse to the applicant, viz. the rent arrears, which outweighed and “nullified” the head start. In the present case, the claimant is not in rent arrears and her application has no adverse or outweighing factors. All that can be said is that she has an absence of factors which would otherwise entitle her to more points.”

3.146 In line with R v Wolverhampton Metropolitan Borough Council ex p Watters¹, qualification (or disqualification) criteria which refer to an individual’s conduct have been accepted as lawful by the courts, even if the individual thereby disqualified would otherwise be entitled to a reasonable preference². Indeed use of a qualifying class based on former housing misbehaviour or some other default appears to be increasing³.

² As in the case of R (Edward) v Royal Borough of Greenwich [2016] EWHC 3410 (Admin) and R (YA) v Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council [2016] EWHC 1850 (Admin) although it appears that in neither case was the challenge brought on the basis that the reasonable preference requirement was breached.

3.147 This is consistent with the provisions for the individual ineligibility of applicants on grounds of unacceptable behaviour which previously applied in England and now only apply in Wales (see 3.151–3.200). It would also explain the otherwise somewhat confusing guidance given in the English Code⁴:

‘Housing authorities should avoid setting criteria which disqualify groups of people whose members are likely to be accorded reasonable preference for social housing, for example on medical or welfare grounds. However, authorities may wish to adopt criteria which would disqualify individuals who satisfy the reasonable preference requirements. This could be the case, for example, if applicants are disqualified on a ground of anti-social behaviour.’⁵

3.148 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

(2) Entirely excluding from the scheme a person entitled to a reasonable preference is likely to be unlawful (R (HA) v Ealing London Borough Council) unless the exclusion relates to his or her individual conduct (R v Wolverhampton Metropolitan Borough Council ex p Watters) or is related to the statutory purpose of allocation (R (Alemi) v Westminster City Council).

(3) A scheme which permits a person with reasonable preference to be on the waiting list for an allocation of social housing but which prevents him or her from bidding, regardless of the strength of his or her case, will be unlawful. The applicant's exclusion from bidding means that he or she has been given no preference at all, contrary to HA 1996, Pt 6: R (Alemi) v Westminster City Council.

(4) A scheme which permits a person with reasonable preference to be on the waiting list for an allocation of social housing but which prevents him or her from bidding because of the strength (or weakness) of his or her case will be lawful: R (Woolfe) v Islington London Borough Council. In contrast to the proposition outlined in (3), the applicant is being given preference, albeit at a reduced level such that he or she cannot bid. The applicant has not been completely excluded from the scheme because if his or her circumstances change, or further evidence is forthcoming, he or she may then be entitled to bid.

3.149 As with the approach to the eligibility of applicants (see 3.201–3.203), the statutory guidance recommends that local housing authorities in England which have adopted qualifying or non-qualifying classes should consider whether an applicant qualifies for an allocation both at the time of the initial application and then again when considering making an allocation, particularly where a long time has elapsed since the original application.

When to consider qualification

3.150 A decision that an applicant does not fall within a qualifying class or falls within a non-qualifying class must be notified to the applicant in writing with the grounds for that decision. The local housing allocation scheme must provide the applicant with a right to have a review of such a decision and to be notified in writing of the grounds for any review decision. For information on challenging review decisions see Chapter 2.

INELIGIBILITY DUE TO UNACCEPTABLE BEHAVIOUR (WALES)

Introduction

3.151 If a person is eligible for an allocation of social housing, because he or she is not caught by the provisions relating to immigration status explored in the first part of this chapter, he or she would ordinarily be able to be considered alongside all other applicants seeking a social housing allocation. However, from early 1997 to 18 June 2012, the provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, enabled local housing authorities in both England and Wales to decide, on a case-by-case basis, that certain applicants were ineligible for allocation on account of their previous misconduct.

3.152 When HA 1996, Pt 6, was amended in June 2012 to allow local housing authorities in England to introduce qualifying classes of applicants, in the manner described in the second part of this chapter, the specific power to decide that certain individual applicants were ineligible on grounds of past misconduct became redundant and was repealed in relation to England.

2. English Code, para 2.4.

3.153 However, the misconduct-related eligibility provisions remain fully in force in Wales and the text which follows deals primarily with their effect on applications made to local housing authorities in Wales. The text may also be of interest in respect of any outstanding issues arising from their use by local housing authorities in England in relation to decisions made before 18 June 2012.

An overview

3.154 A local housing authority in Wales may decide, but is not required to decide, that an applicant is to be treated as ineligible for the allocation of social housing as a result of his or her past unacceptable behaviour, or the behaviour of a member of his or her household. The wording of the statutory provision (HA 1996, s 160A) prevents local housing authorities in Wales from operating blanket exclusions, and requires them to consider, if they are minded to use the ineligibility provision, the behaviour of each applicant, or of a member of his or her household, individually.

1. HA 1996, s 160A(7)–(8) and Welsh Code, para 2.29.
3.155 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

3.155 A local housing authority’s decision that an applicant is ‘ineligible’ on behaviour grounds, and thus excluded from consideration for an allocation, requires consideration of two stages:

(1) Does the applicant meet certain statutory conditions? If so,

(2) Should the local housing authority, in the exercise of its discretion, elect to treat the applicant as ‘ineligible’ as a result of the applicant fulfilling those conditions?

1 HA 1996, s 160A(7).

3.156 As far as the first stage of the test for ineligibility on behaviour grounds is concerned, there are two statutory conditions:

(1) that the applicant, or a member of his or her household, has been guilty of past unacceptable behaviour of a specified standard (described in the rest of this chapter as Condition One); and

(2) that in the circumstances at the time when the application for allocation is considered, the applicant is unsuitable to be a tenant of the local housing authority by reason of that past behaviour (described in the rest of this chapter as Condition Two).

2 HA 1996, s 160A(7)(b).

3.157 At the second stage the local housing authority is deciding, in the exercise of an unfettered discretion, whether to treat an applicant who satisfies both of the two statutory conditions as ineligible for its scheme.

3.158 It was confirmed by the then UK Government during the passage of what became the Homelessness Act 2002 that the two statutory conditions of the first stage constitute a ‘high test’, intended to exclude ‘only those applicants whose behaviour would genuinely render them unsuitable to be a tenant’.

1 DTLR memo to the Joint Select Committee on Human Rights, para 6.3, reproduced in the Appendix to the report of the Joint Committee dated 7 November 2001.

3.159 The UK Government emphasised that the power to decide that an individual was ineligible for allocation was a discretionary power, that local housing authorities were not required to use it, and that it could only be used in a manner that was compatible with an applicant’s Convention rights. Even an applicant who met the first stage conditions may not necessarily be found ineligible in the exercise of the second stage discretion. The Government also referred to the safety net of accommodation available to those excluded from an allocation under the National Assistance Act 1948 and the Children Act 1989, and noted that persons declared ineligible by virtue of their behaviour would still be eligible for housing benefit, and thus able to access private rented accommodation.

2 These statutes have been replaced in respect of Wales by the Social Services and Well-being Act 2014. See 20.69–20.98. The relevant powers and duties to provide accommodation under the National Assistance Act 1948 have been replaced in respect of England by the Care Act 2014. See 20.19–20.38.
Ineligibility due to unacceptable behaviour (Wales) 3.164

3.160 The Joint Select Committee remained concerned that those excluded from eligibility by their behaviour might suffer degrading treatment by reason of homelessness affecting their health and welfare, or suffer a failure of respect for their home and family life but nevertheless concluded that the provision was compatible with Convention rights.

1 The ineligibility provision relating to misconduct has yet to generate any litigation claiming that it is incompatible with the provisions of Human Rights Act 1998, although it has been unsuccessfully contended that a decision that an applicant is not eligible for an allocation engages (and may infringe) the right to respect for a home protected by Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Art 8:

The statutory conditions

Condition One: guilty of unacceptable behaviour

3.161 The first condition is that the local housing authority must be satisfied that the applicant or a member of his or her household has been guilty of unacceptable behaviour serious enough to make him or her unsuitable to be a tenant of that authority.

The statutory definition of ‘unacceptable behaviour’

3.162 Parliament has defined ‘unacceptable behaviour’ as only such behaviour, by the applicant or by a member of his or her household, which would, if the applicant were a secure tenant of the local housing authority, entitle it to a possession order on any ground in Housing Act 1985, s 84A or in Sch 2, Pt 1, (other than Ground 8).

1 HA 1996, s 160A(8) as amended.

3.163 This rather curious phrasing generates four important preliminary points.

(1) Literal or hypothetical approach

3.164 The test may arise for application either literally or hypothetically, in that the applicant may or may not have been a secure tenant of the local housing authority against whom a possession order was made on one of the relevant grounds. If the applicant, or a relevant member of his or her household, was at that time a secure tenant of the same local housing authority and a possession order was obtained, then the definition can be readily and literally applied. But in many more circumstances – where the applicant was not a secure tenant of the local housing authority, or no possession order has been made – the question will be hypothetical. The local housing authority will be asking itself: ‘What if the applicant had at that time been one of our secure tenants?’
3.164 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

Welsh Code, para 2.33.

3.165 Indeed, Condition Two of the statutory conditions (discussed at 3.192–3.200) also contains an element that requires either a literal or a hypothetical approach, relating to the identity of the likely future landlord. If the likely future landlord is the local housing authority itself, a literal approach can be taken: ‘Is the applicant ‘unsuitable’ for one of our own tenancies?’ But the ineligibility test is also available where a successful applicant could only expect to be nominated to a different landlord (a registered social landlord in Wales or a different local housing authority). In such a case, the test is one of suitability to be the local housing authority’s tenant even though there is no prospect or possibility of such a tenancy.

Because the local housing authority may have disposed of all of its stock to one or several other social landlords.

(2) The meaning of ‘entitle’

3.166 The second general point to emerge from the definition is the curious use of the word ‘entitle’ in the phrase ‘would . . . entitle the authority to a possession order . . . ’. Most of the relevant grounds for possession are not mandatory grounds. Instead, most of them require the court to find that ‘it is reasonable to make the order’ for possession. Strictly speaking, it is impossible to say that any landlord is ‘entitled’ to possession where possession is sought on a ground that depends (for the grant of an order) on the exercise of discretion by the court. A judge has accepted that ‘the effect of the provisions is to require the local housing authority to be satisfied that a notional county court judge would probably make an outright order for possession in the circumstances of the case’.

Under Housing Act 1985, s 84(2)(a). These grounds are therefore commonly referred to as ‘discretionary grounds’ for possession.

3.167 Since 19 May 2015, the special ‘mandatory ground for possession’ in Housing Act 1985, s 84A has been added as a relevant ground of possession for these purposes. It might be thought that this would make it easier to establish with certainty that the local housing authority would be ‘entitled’ to a possession order but, as the Welsh Code recognises the new ground is subject to the caveat that the court may decline to make a possession order where to grant one would infringe a tenant’s Convention rights. Moreover, the court may refuse to make a possession order where the possession claim amounts to discrimination under the Equality Act 2010 or the local housing authority has failed to comply with its public sector equality duty. However, if an order is made then it will be an outright order for possession, because the usual provisions for postponing or suspending an order (Housing Act 1985, s 85) do not apply to that ground.

2 Welsh Code, para 2.34.

3 Housing Act 1985, s 84A(1). It was confirmed in Manchester City Council v Pinnock [2010] UKSC 45, [2011] 2 AC 104 that where possession proceedings are instituted by a public body, and the tenant does not have any right to remain in their home under domestic law, they may in an appropriate case seek to defend the claim by relying on s 6 of the Human Rights Act 1988 and Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

4 Equality Act 2010, s 149. Defences brought under the Equality Act 2010 to possession claims were considered by the Supreme Court in Akerman-Livingstone v Aster Communities Ltd [2015] UKSC 15, [2015] AC 1399.

(3) The meaning of ‘behaviour’

3.168 The statutory wording is concerned with the ‘behaviour’ of the applicant, or, where relevant, that of a member of his or her household. Indeed, the terminology used is ‘guilty of unacceptable behaviour’. This would naturally be understood to require some past action or activity on that person’s part. But in this context it must, at least arguably, also include an applicant’s omission, failure to act, passivity or inactivity in circumstances where there has been an expectation of action. Otherwise it would not embrace common cases of ‘unacceptable behaviour’ such as:

(1) failing to pay rent or other charges; or
(2) simple inactive non-compliance with obligations under a tenancy, eg failing to maintain the garden; or
(3) failing to control the actions of lodgers or visitors.

1 HA 1996, s 160A(7)(a).

3.169 Such a wide construction would be consistent with the judicial approach to the term ‘guilty of conduct causing or likely to cause a nuisance or annoyance’ in a statutory ground for possession. It is rather surprising that, in this context, parliamentary counsel did not adopt the now familiar rubric of ‘deliberately does or fails to do anything’ to be found in other provisions of HA 1996.

2 Such as the test of becoming homelessness intentionally in HA 1996, s 191(1) or H(W)A 2014, s 77. See 13.42–13.48.

3.170 The statutory emphasis on the behaviour of the applicant (or a member of the applicant’s household) was relied upon by the claimant in R (McQ) v Bolton Metropolitan Borough Council. He had given up his former home for reasons associated with the anti-social behaviour of third parties with whom he had been involved. He argued that that conduct (being neither his conduct nor that of any member of his household) was irrelevant. The Administrative Court held that the claimant’s former association with the third parties – members of a paramilitary organisation in Northern Ireland which had undertaken the anti-social conduct – itself constituted ample factual material to support the decision that his own behaviour would have notionally made out the statutory grounds for possession.

(4) Household membership

3.171 Plainly, the policy of HA 1996, Pt 6, reflected in the wording used, is to avoid the ineligibility control from being circumvented by an application being made in the name of an innocent member of the household rather than by the actual perpetrator of the misconduct. Accordingly, local housing authorities may consider not only the applicant’s own behaviour but also that of ‘a member of his [or her] household’.1 HA 1996, Pt 6 contains no statutory definition of the term ‘household’. It will therefore be for the local housing authority to decide which persons constitute the applicant’s household for these purposes. The local housing authority’s allocation scheme might set out how membership of a household will be ascertained or may be silent on the issue, leaving the decision to be made by officers on the facts of individual cases interpreting ‘household’ by reference ‘to its ordinary, everyday usage’.

2. The Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman has criticised a local housing authority whose scheme failed to clarify how adult children would be dealt with: Complaint against Kettering Borough Council, 16012028, 3 August 2017, (2017) November Legal Action, p 41.

3.172 HA 1996, Pt 6, appears to be looking to the present household composition. So, an applicant with an unblemished past may find that he or she is rendered ineligible by having formed a common household with a person who brings to that household past misconduct, either the new partner’s own misconduct, or that of any other person. As will be seen, the innocent applicant is only saved from any adverse consequence of the new partner’s past misconduct if that history is immaterial to the applicant’s own present suitability to be a tenant.

1. See 3.193.

3.173 But the statutory provision could be interpreted as also engaging with the past composition of the applicant’s household. HA 1996, Pt 6, when defining unacceptable behaviour, does so in terms that include past ‘behaviour of a member of his [or her] household’. Given that the statutory language is taking attention back to past misbehaviour, arguably it could be capable of being satisfied by the misconduct of a person who was at that time a member of the applicant’s household but is no longer. If correct, this would protect against the situation in which an applicant may have temporarily separated from a past member of his or her household to avoid the prospect of ineligibility through misconduct, with every intention of resuming residence together once a tenancy has been allocated. It does mean, however, that an innocent applicant, whose former miscreant household member has permanently departed, may nevertheless still be disqualified. Whilst a safeguard is provided by the requirement that the past misconduct must presently render the applicant unsuitable as a tenant (Condition Two – discussed at 3.192–3.200), that requirement may well be met, even where the perpetrator is long gone, if it is considered material that the applicant failed to bring to an earlier end the other person’s misconduct.

Applying the statutory definition of ‘unacceptable behaviour’

3.174 On detailed examination, the definition in HA 1996, s 160A(8), itself breaks down into three constituent questions, each of which the local housing authority needs to address in succession:

1) Is one, or are more than one, of the relevant grounds for possession made out by the circumstances of the past behaviour?

2) If so, would a court make an absolute order under Housing Act 1985, s 84A or consider it reasonable to make an order for possession under Housing Act 1985, Sch 2, Pt 1, Grounds 1–7 on the basis of that behaviour?

3) If so, would a court make an outright order for possession?

3.175 The applicant is only guilty of ‘unacceptable behaviour’ for the purposes of this statutory provision if the local housing authority is able to answer ‘Yes’ to all three questions. It can be readily envisaged that different local housing authorities may well give different answers to some or all of these questions, even when considering the same set of facts. Indeed, it might be thought common knowledge that a county court judge sitting at one court would certainly evict for a particular level of misconduct which, had the matter been tried before the county court judge at another court, would have resulted in dismissal or adjournment of the possession claim or the making of a suspended or postponed order for possession. Precisely because the making of a possession order will often require a discretionary decision, the statutory definition is sensitive to such variables.

1 See 3.178.

Grounds for possession

3.176 The first step in applying the statutory definition is to be clear as to the wording of the relevant statutory grounds for possession. The current wording of Housing Act 1985, Sch 2, Pt 1, Grounds 1–7 and of Housing Act 1985, s 84A, is given in Tables A and B respectively.

Grounds For Possession Under Housing Act 1985, s 84, Sch 2, Pt 1, Grounds 1–7

| Ground 1 | Rent lawfully due from the tenant has not been paid or an obligation of the tenancy has been broken or not performed. |
| Ground 2 | The tenant or a person residing in or visiting the dwelling-house: |
3.176 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

(1) has been guilty of conduct causing or likely to cause a nuisance or annoyance to a person residing, visiting or otherwise engaging in a lawful activity in the locality; or

(2) has been guilty of conduct causing or likely to cause a nuisance or annoyance to the landlord of the dwelling-house, or a person employed (whether or not by the landlord) in connection with the exercise of the landlord’s housing management functions, and that is directly or indirectly related to or affects those functions; or

(3) has been convicted of:
   (i) using the dwelling-house or allowing it to be used for immoral or illegal purposes; or
   (ii) an indictable offence committed in, or in the locality of, the dwelling-house.

Ground 2A
The dwelling-house was occupied (whether alone or with others) by a married couple, a couple who are civil partners of each other, a couple living together as husband and wife or a couple living together as if they were civil partners and:
(a) one or both of the partners is a tenant of the dwelling-house;
(b) one partner has left because of violence or threats of violence by the other towards:
   (i) that partner, or
   (ii) a member of the family of that partner who was residing with that partner immediately before the partner left; and
(c) the court is satisfied that the partner who has left is unlikely to return.

Ground 3
The condition of the dwelling-house or of any of the common parts has deteriorated owing to acts of waste by, or the neglect or default of, the tenant or a person residing in the dwelling-house and, in the case of an act of waste by, or the neglect or default of, a person lodging with the tenant or a sub-tenant of his, the tenant has not taken such steps as he ought reasonably to have taken for the removal of the lodger or sub-tenant.

Ground 4
The condition of furniture provided by the landlord for use under the tenancy, or for use in the common parts, has deteriorated owing to ill-treatment by the tenant or a person residing in the dwelling-house and, in the case of ill-treatment by a person lodging with the tenant or a sub-tenant of his, the tenant has not taken such steps as he ought reasonably to have taken for the removal of the lodger or sub-tenant.

Ground 5
The tenant is the person, or one of the persons, to whom the tenancy was granted and the landlord was induced to grant the tenancy by a false statement made knowingly or recklessly by:
(a) the tenant; or
(b) a person acting at the tenant’s instigation.
Ineligibility due to unacceptable behaviour (Wales) 3.176

Ground 6  The tenancy was assigned to the tenant, or to a predecessor in title of his who is a member of his family and is residing in the dwelling-house, by an assignment made by virtue of s 92 (assignments by way of exchange) and a premium was paid either in connection with that assignment or the assignment which the tenant or predecessor himself made by virtue of that section. In this paragraph ‘premium’ means any fine or other like sum and any other pecuniary consideration in addition to rent.

Ground 7  The dwelling-house forms part of, or is within the curtilage of, a building which, or so much of it as is held by the landlord, is held mainly for purposes other than housing purposes and consists mainly of accommodation other than housing accommodation, and:

(a) the dwelling-house was let to the tenant or a predecessor in title of his in consequence of the tenant or predecessor being in the employment of the landlord; or of – a local authority;
   – a new town corporation;
   – a housing action trust;
   – an urban development corporation; or – the governors of an aided school; and

(b) the tenant or a person residing in the dwelling-house has been guilty of conduct such that, having regard to the purpose for which the building is used, it would not be right for him to continue in occupation of the dwelling-house.

1 This sub-paragraph was inserted by Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, s 98(1) with effect from 13 May 2014: Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 (Commencement No 1 and Transitory Provisions) (Wales) Order 2014, SI 2014/1241, art 2(a).
2 ‘Indictable’ was inserted by Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, s 111 and Sch 7, in force from 1 January 2006 (Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (Commencement No 4 and Transitory Provision) Order 2005, SI 2005/3495, art 2(1)(m)).
3 Ground ZZA is not included in this table as it applies only to secure tenancies of dwellings in England: Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, s 99(1).
4 Inserted by Civil Partnership Act 2004, s 81, s 263(2) and Sch 8, in force from 5 December 2005 (Civil Partnership Act 2004 (Commencement No 2) Order 2005, SI 2005/3175).
5 Inserted by Civil Partnership Act 2004, s 81, s 263(2) and Sch 8, in force from 5 December 2005 (Civil Partnership Act 2004 (Commencement No 2) Order 2005, SI 2005/3175).

Grounds For Possession Under Housing Act 1985, s 84A

Sections 84A(1)-(8) provide:

(1) If the court is satisfied that any of the following conditions is met, it must make an order for the possession of a dwelling-house let under a secure tenancy.
   This is subject to subsection (2) (and to any available defence based on the tenant’s Convention rights, within the meaning of the Human Rights Act 1998).

(2) Subsection (1) applies only where the landlord has complied with any obligations it has under section 85ZA (review of decision to seek possession).
3.176 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

(3) Condition 1 is that—
(a) the tenant, or a person residing in or visiting the dwelling-house, has been convicted of a serious offence, and
(b) the serious offence—
   (i) was committed (wholly or partly) in, or in the locality of, the dwelling-house,
   (ii) was committed elsewhere against a person with a right (of whatever description) to reside in, or occupy housing accommodation in the locality of, the dwelling-house, or
   (iii) was committed elsewhere against the landlord of the dwelling-house, or a person employed (whether or not by the landlord) in connection with the exercise of the landlord’s housing management functions, and directly or indirectly related to or affected those functions.

(4) Condition 2 is that a court has found in relevant proceedings that the tenant, or a person residing in or visiting the dwelling-house, has breached a provision of an injunction under section 1 of the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, other than a provision requiring a person to participate in a particular activity, and—
(a) the breach occurred in, or in the locality of, the dwelling-house, or
(b) the breach occurred elsewhere and the provision breached was a provision intended to prevent—
   (i) conduct that is capable of causing nuisance or annoyance to a person with a right (of whatever description) to reside in, or occupy housing accommodation in the locality of, the dwelling-house, or
   (ii) conduct that is capable of causing nuisance or annoyance to the landlord of the dwelling-house, or a person employed (whether or not by the landlord) in connection with the exercise of the landlord’s housing management functions, and that is directly or indirectly related to or affects those functions.

(5) Condition 3 is that the tenant, or a person residing in or visiting the dwelling-house, has been convicted of an offence under section 30 of the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 consisting of a breach of a provision of a criminal behaviour order prohibiting a person from doing anything described in the order, and the offence involved—
(a) a breach that occurred in, or in the locality of, the dwelling-house, or
(b) a breach that occurred elsewhere of a provision intended to prevent—
   (i) behaviour that causes or is likely to cause harassment, alarm or distress to a person with a right (of whatever description) to reside in, or occupy housing accommodation in the locality of, the dwelling-house, or
   (ii) behaviour that causes or is likely to cause harassment, alarm or distress to the landlord of the dwelling-house, or a person employed (whether or not by the landlord) in connection with the exercise of the landlord’s housing management functions, and that is directly or indirectly related to or affects those functions.

(6) Condition 4 is that—
(a) the dwelling-house is or has been subject to a closure order under section 80 of the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, and
Ineligibility due to unacceptable behaviour (Wales) 3.178

(b) access to the dwelling-house has been prohibited (under the closure order or under a closure notice issued under section 76 of that Act) for a continuous period of more than 48 hours.

(7) Condition 5 is that—
(a) the tenant, or a person residing in or visiting the dwelling-house, has been convicted of an offence under—
(i) section 80(4) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 (breach of abatement notice in relation to statutory nuisance), or
(ii) section 82(8) of that Act (breach of court order to abate statutory nuisance etc.), and
(b) the nuisance concerned was noise emitted from the dwelling-house which was a statutory nuisance for the purposes of Pt 3 of that Act by virtue of section 79(1)(g) of that Act (noise emitted from premises so as to be prejudicial to health or a nuisance).

(8) Condition 1, 2, 3, 4 or 5 is not met if—
(a) there is an appeal against the conviction, finding or order concerned which has not been finally determined, abandoned or withdrawn, or
(b) the final determination of the appeal results in the conviction, finding or order being overturned.

3.177 In practice, behaviour that falls within either or both of Grounds 1 or 2 in Table A (arrears, breach of tenancy, and/or nuisance) is likely to be the most common form of ‘unacceptable behaviour’ considered by local housing authorities. But when considering the applicant’s behaviour, or that of a member of his or her household, local housing authorities should take care to ensure that the behaviour would in fact have given rise to a ground for possession by satisfying the precise wording of the statute. For example, the only ‘rent’ that counts for Ground 1 purposes is ‘rent lawfully due’, and not unpaid instalments of overpaid housing benefit, or arrears owed by a previous tenant. Likewise, nuisance behaviour or indictable offences committed away from the locality of the dwelling-house do not fall within Ground 2.

2 Tickner v Clifton [1929] 1 KB 207, Div Ct.
3 Save as now provided for by the enlargement of Ground 2 in May 2014, as shown in the table, in relation to conduct directed at the landlord.

Reasonableness

3.178 However, if the applicant’s behaviour, or that of a member of his or her household, demonstrably does fall within the precise words of one or more of the grounds for possession in Table A, the next question is whether it would have been reasonable for a court to make an order for possession on those facts. The question arises because all of those prescribed grounds are discretionary grounds upon which the landlord must be able to satisfy the court that ‘it is reasonable to make’ a possession order (of whatever type). The test of reasonableness is a very broad one, and will depend on the individual circumstances of each case. The courts themselves are warned by judicial precedent against applying hard and fast rules. The Welsh Code suggests that in deciding whether it is reasonable to make an order a court may consider ‘the conduct of both parties and the public interest’ and that the court must have regard to the interests and circumstances of the tenant (and of his or her household), the local housing authority and the wider public.\(^1\)
3.178 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

1 Housing Act 1985, s 84(2). But the grounds in Table B are not ‘discretionary’.

\(^{3}\) Welsh Code, Annex 10.

\(^{4}\) Welsh Code, para 2.34.

3.179 Where the behaviour consists of allowing ‘rent arrears’ to accrue, a court hearing possession proceedings would normally consider, on the question of reasonableness:

- the level of the arrears;
- the reason for the arrears accruing, including the degree of personal culpability for those arrears;
- any outstanding housing benefit issues;
- any offers to repay; and
- the tenant’s, and his or her household’s, personal circumstances.\(^1\)

3.180 If relevant past behaviour was ‘nuisance or annoyance’, the court hearing a possession claim under Sch 2, Ground 2 is required to consider:

- the effect that the nuisance or annoyance has had on persons other than the person against whom the order is sought;
- any continuing effect the nuisance or annoyance is likely to have on such persons; and
- the effect that the nuisance or annoyance would be likely to have on such persons if the conduct is repeated.\(^1\)

1 Housing Act 1985, s 85A, inserted by Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, s 16 (with effect from 30 June 2004).

3.181 The court hearing a possession claim based on nuisance behaviour under Sch 2, Ground 2 should also consider:

- the tenant’s personal circumstances and those of his or her household;
- the landlord’s obligation to its other tenants and to the neighbours;
- the degree of personal culpability of the tenant;
- any factors explaining or mitigating the behaviour (such as a medical condition or a disability);
- the degree of compliance since notices were served and/or proceedings issued;
- any assurances as to future conduct; and
- any other relevant circumstances.\(^1\)

Ineligibility due to unacceptable behaviour (Wales) 3.185

3.182 Where the behaviour in question consists of the commission of a serious criminal offence in the dwelling-house or in the locality of the dwelling-house, it would only be in exceptional circumstances that the court dealing with a Ground in Table A would consider that it is not reasonable to make an order for possession (although, in such a case, a court should also consider the possibility that an order for possession, suspended or postponed on conditions, could succeed in controlling the tenant’s behaviour).

3.183 In R (McQ) v Bolton Metropolitan Borough Council, the applicant argued that the local housing authority’s decision on his application for social housing had failed to address the question of whether a judge would have found it ‘reasonable’ to make an order for possession (assuming that a ground for possession based on anti-social behaviour would have been made out). In refusing permission to bring judicial review proceedings, the Administrative Court held that there was only one answer to the question of whether it would have been reasonable to make an order for possession on the facts of the applicant’s case, which was that it would have been reasonable.

3.184 For guidance on the application of the reasonableness requirement as operated in relation to the other relevant prescribed grounds of possession in Table A, see the discussion in Luba, Gallagher, McConnell and Madge Defending Possession Proceedings.

Nature of the order

3.185 The final question for the local housing authority, in applying the ‘unacceptable behaviour’ limb of the ineligibility test, is whether the court did make (or, in the hypothetical cases, would have made) an outright or a suspended/postponed (conditional) order. HA 1996, Pt 6, is silent as to whether suspended or postponed (conditional) possession orders fall within the statutory definition, which refers only to ‘a possession order’. However, the Code of Guidance is very clear that only behaviour that would result in an outright order for possession falls within the statute. During the Parliamentary debate on the then Homelessness Bill, the opposition quoted figures for the number of possession actions brought by social landlords in 2000, showing that in 82% of possession cases the social landlord had believed that it was entitled to an outright order for possession, but the court decided that it was not. In response, the Minister gave assurances that only behaviour justifying an outright, rather than a suspended or postponed (conditional), possession order would fall within this section:

‘...the authority would need to be satisfied that, if a possession order were granted, it would not be suspended by the court.’

4 Hansard, HL Deb, vol 629, ser 6, col CWH 48 (10 December 2001) (Baroness Maddock):
150,000 actions were started (the vast majority being for rent arrears); 65% resulted in an order being made; but only 18% resulted in an outright order for possession.
5 Hansard, HL Deb, vol 629, ser 6, col CWH 51 (10 December 2001) (Lord Falconer).

3.186 If an outright order was in fact granted in relation to the past misconduct, there is, perhaps, little difficulty with this element of the definition. But applying it to hypothetical cases is probably the most difficult part of the local housing authority’s decision-making on ineligibility for misbehaviour. Whether an order is made outright, or is suspended or postponed on terms, is a very broad discretionary decision for the court dealing with a Table A ground, taking into account all the circumstances as at the date of the decision. It is not sufficient for the local housing authority to conclude that, on the facts as they have emerged, it would have requested that the court make an outright possession order. For the applicant not to be eligible, the local housing authority must be able to conclude that a court would in all probability have actually made an outright possession order and not a suspended or postponed (conditional) possession order.

2 Housing Act 1985, s 85(2) and see Birmingham City Council v Ashton [2012] EWCA Civ 1557, [2013] HLR 8, CA.

3.187 Examples of behaviour that may lead to only a suspended or postponed possession (conditional) order are given in the Code:

- modest rent arrears, absence of persistent default, delays in housing benefit, liability for a partner’s debts, the applicant was not in control of the household finances or was unaware of the accrual of arrears, the local housing authority failed to provide help and advice; or
- where allegations of nuisance are relatively minor, or the nuisance was caused by a member of the household who has since left, or the court would have been satisfied that a suspended or postponed (conditional) order would be sufficient to control the household’s future behaviour.

1 Welsh Code, para 2.36.
2 Welsh Code, para 2.37.

3.188 Local housing authorities frequently request that courts make outright possession orders, but they do not always obtain them.

1 Of landlord possession orders being made in county courts in England and Wales in the last quarter of 2017, 35% were suspended. (Mortgage and landlord possession statistics in England and Wales: October to December 2017 (Provisional), Ministry of Justice, February 2018. This figure covers all landlord possession claims, including those in which the court had no power to suspend the order, eg those brought by private landlords against assured shorthold tenants.

3.189 As far as rent arrears are concerned, day-to-day practice in the courts suggests that suspended or postponed (conditional) possession orders are made regularly. Postponed or suspended (conditional) possession orders are not confined to cases of arrears that are the responsibility, but not the fault, of the tenant. In practice, suspended or postponed (conditional) possession orders are made where there are realistic offers by the tenant to repay the arrears, however the arrears accrued.

3.190 In nuisance cases, the question is whether there is (or would have been) a sound basis, supported by cogent evidence, for hope that the tenant will observe the terms of their tenancy agreement in future. Suspended or postponed (conditional) possession orders have been approved by the Court of Appeal where the behaviour appears to have ceased, or where the court considers that a postponed (conditional) possession order should be a sufficient deterrent from future misconduct. Often the principal considerations for the court are whether the tenant has some insight into the nuisance caused to his or her neighbours, and whether the court can accept the tenant’s assurances as to future behaviour: the tenant does not have to give a cast-iron guarantee, but a social landlord does not have to accept a tenant who sets out to breach the terms of his tenancy. The prescribed statutory criteria which apply in a nuisance case and may have driven the court to be satisfied that it was ‘reasonable’ to order possession do not expressly apply to the stage at which the court is deciding whether the order should be outright, suspended or postponed, but they are intended to remind the court that the focus is on the effect that nuisance and annoyance has on others, and it would be appropriate to consider them again at this stage. Of course, if the particular conduct under consideration meets one of the conditions for the making of an order under Housing Act 1985, s 84A (see Table B above), a possession order may have been actually (or hypothetically) granted under that provision. However, the new absolute ground is intended only ‘for the most serious cases of antisocial behaviour and landlords should ensure that the ground is used selectively’.

3.190 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

3.191 Two cases well illustrate the operation of this element of the statutory conditions for ineligibility on behaviour grounds:

(1) In R (Dixon) v Wandsworth London Borough Council, the applicant had a history of drug-related incidents at his former home. He accepted that a ground for possession would have been made out and that a judge would have found it reasonable to have made a possession order. However, he challenged the decision of the local housing authority – that he was not eligible for an allocation – on the grounds that his conduct would not have led to the making of an outright order, but only to a suspended or postponed (conditional) order. His claim failed. The judge was satisfied that, in reaching the decision that a county court would probably have granted an outright order, the reviewing officer had applied the correct test, had regard to the relevant considerations, made proper findings of fact (in a lengthy decision letter) and had not reached an irrational conclusion. The applicant’s renewed application for permission to appeal was rejected by the Court of Appeal, which said:

‘it was open to the authority to conclude that an outright order was likely to be made on the facts of this case. The applicant had a history of drug abuse for a period of ten years, during which time the flat was raided three times. The raid that resulted in this conviction had caused £1000 worth of damage to the flat itself, and each raid must have been very disturbing for the applicant’s neighbours.’

(2) In R (M) v Hackney London Borough Council, the applicant was an elderly council tenant living alone and seeking a transfer. He had a long history of convictions for sexual offences and in 2004 he had been made subject, by consent, to a sexual offences prevention order which recited activities relating to a teenage boy. The local housing authority decided that the events of 2004 were so serious that, had possession been sought on the basis of them, the court would have granted an outright order. Dismissing a claim for judicial review of that decision, the judge emphasised that the judgment as to whether an outright order would have been made was one for the housing authority not the reviewing court. He said:

‘The Council took the view that the incident of 2004 constituted anti-social behaviour sufficient to justify an outright possession order. In considering that matter I have regard to two background factors. In Hensley Gage LJ referred to the need for a council, as a provider of social housing, to make sure that its properties are properly managed and kept free from undesirable activity. It is in my view also necessary to underline the remarks in the judgment of Otton LJ, which I have quoted, that the judicial and administrative functions should not be elided. Admittedly the remarks were in a somewhat different context. But the message to me is clear: it is not for me to allocate Hackney’s housing.’

Condition Two: unsuitable to be a tenant

3.192 The second condition necessary to sustain a decision of ineligibility on behaviour grounds is that, at the time that the application for allocation falls to be considered, the applicant is still unsuitable to be a tenant of the local housing authority by reason of past behaviour. It must be noted that the relevant date for applying this test is the date on which the local housing authority reaches a decision on eligibility or concludes a review of that decision, not the date that the application for allocation was made.

3.193 In determining whether past behaviour renders the applicant currently ‘unsuitable’, local housing authorities should consider whether the tenant’s behaviour has improved, whether the circumstances that caused the behaviour have changed (eg in the case of nuisance behaviour that was caused by drug or alcohol problems whether the tenant has successfully resolved those problems), whether the member of the household who was responsible for the behaviour remains a member of the applicant’s household, and whether it can accept any assurances from the applicant as to future behaviour.

1 Welsh Code, para 2.38.
2 Hansard, HL Deb, vol 629, ser 6, col CWH 52, (10 December 2001), the Minister, Lord Falconer, referred to the circumstances as ‘all the relevant matters before it. Those will include all the circumstances relevant to the particular applicant, whether health, dependents or other factors’.

3.194 If the local housing authority has reason to believe that the past unacceptable behaviour was due to physical, mental or learning difficulties, it should consider whether the applicant could now maintain a tenancy with appropriate care and support. Local housing authorities cannot adopt a blanket approach of treating all applicants who were in the past guilty of nuisance behaviour, or were in substantial rent arrears, as ineligible.

1 Welsh Code, para 2.38.

The exercise of the local housing authority’s discretion

3.195 Even if the statutory conditions for ineligibility on the basis of past behaviour are made out, the local housing authority must go on to consider whether to exercise its discretion to treat the applicant as ineligible due to that unacceptable behaviour. The word used in HA 1996, Pt 6, s 160A(7) is ‘may’ and not ‘shall’, making it clear that the local housing authority has such a discretion.

1 HA 1996, s 160A(7).
3.196 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

3.196 The local housing authority must take into account, in exercising this discretion, the applicant’s particular circumstances, any health needs, any dependents and any other relevant factors. The importance of the discretion is most acutely demonstrated in cases where the applicant meets the statutory conditions for ineligibility by reason of previous default in payment of rent and still has arrears outstanding. The local housing authority must be careful not to automatically bar such applicants but instead must exercise discretion on a case-by-case basis. It is essential to avoid loose language which suggests that a fixed rule rather than a discretion is being exercised, e.g. ‘It is the policy of this Council not to make offers to applicants who owe property related debts’.

1 Welsh Code, para 2.39.

3.197 The local housing authority, faced with a case meeting the statutory conditions, could nevertheless decide to accept the applicant as eligible for its allocation scheme, but give him or her no preference (even if he or she would otherwise have been entitled to a statutory reasonable preference). The Code reminds local housing authorities that they are not obliged to find that an applicant is ineligible on the grounds of unacceptable behaviour, but could instead give the applicant no preference. However, the local housing authority cannot refuse to give any preference at all to an applicant in a category entitled to a reasonable preference except on the same specified grounds as the ‘unacceptable behaviour’ test of eligibility.

3 HA 1996, s 167(2A), (2B) and (2C); Welsh Code, para 2.42.

3.198 The Welsh Code sets out detailed policy considerations for local housing authorities to take into account when they are deciding whether or not to treat applicants as ineligible on the grounds of unacceptable behaviour. Starting from the view that ‘barriers to social housing should be minimised’, the Code recommends that local housing authorities should:

- consider their role as providers of social housing in order to meet housing need in their area;
- develop their own ‘unacceptable behaviour’ policies specifying the grounds when a person is likely to be thought ineligible;
- keep restricted access measures to a minimum;
- work collaboratively with the police, probation services and other statutory and voluntary agencies to share information;
- avoid unreasonable application requirements;
- monitor and evaluate their policies and practice;
- develop common restricted access policies with housing association partners; and
- be prepared to consider applicants with former tenant rent arrears.

1 Welsh Code, para 2.44.
When to determine eligibility and qualification 3.201

3.199 The Welsh Code suggests that policies regarding the application of sanctions on the grounds of unacceptable behaviour should:

‘accommodate the broader Welsh Government policy aims of equality of opportunity, social inclusion and sustainability. Therefore, sanctions to exclude people from social housing should be kept to a minimum and support mechanisms developed to maximise opportunities for people to secure social housing.’

1 Welsh Code, para 2.29.

3.200 There has been no systematic national monitoring of the operation of the ineligibility provisions relating to behaviour, even during the period when the provisions applied in both England and Wales. It is simply not known how many applicants have been held to fall within the statutory conditions and how many of those have gone on to be excluded from an allocation scheme in the exercise of a local housing authority’s discretion. A limited study of local housing authorities in England1 found that ‘considerable staff member discretion is often used in determining appropriate treatment of applicants with rent arrears or believed previously responsible for anti-social behaviour. Whether actions taken are fully recorded and monitored is a question beyond the scope of this research’2. In Wales, 11 local housing authorities participated in a study specifically looking at exclusions from allocation schemes3. Of those, eight local housing authorities provided copies of their relevant policies. The researchers found that ‘not all the exclusion policies and procedures examined were lawful’ and that, during the single year 2006–07, just four of those authorities had excluded a total of 129 applicants.

WHEN TO DETERMINE ELIGIBILITY AND QUALIFICATION

3.201 Under HA 1996, Pt 6, as originally enacted, the eligibility test operated as a control on the admission of an applicant to the local housing register. With the abolition in 2003 of the requirement to keep housing registers, the scheme now works by prohibiting the allocation of housing to ineligible applicants. This has led to the practice of testing eligibility twice in respect of any given applicant. First, the eligibility tests are operated when an applicant initially applies for consideration under the particular local allocation scheme. Second, assuming satisfaction of the tests at that stage, they are applied again later when the allocation of a specific property is being contemplated. For an applicant who passed the eligibility test when he or she initially applied, this can mean that changed circumstances might render him or her ineligible just prior to the point at which he or she would have been allocated a property. The English Code advises that a similar approach should be taken in relation to checking at both stages for ‘qualification’.

1 English Code, para 3.26 and see 3.149.
3.202 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

3.202 There are two obvious justifications for this double testing. First, if an applicant is admitted for consideration under the local scheme, he or she will reasonably believe the local housing authority has satisfied itself that he or she is entitled to be allocated property under that scheme and he or she is likely to put time and effort into bidding on properties. It is important, therefore, that eligibility and/or qualification is tested on initial application. Second, there must be a further check just prior to the later prospective allocation of a specific property, because otherwise the local housing authority may mistakenly infringe the statutory injunction that it ‘shall not allocate’ to an ineligible person. That second check may identify a person who was initially eligible, on his or her earlier application, but is not eligible when a specific allocation is about to be made. It is therefore particularly important that when a person from abroad receives an initially favourable decision on eligibility, he or she is informed that any changes to his or her immigration status – or, indeed, changes to the complex statutory rules about eligibility and immigration status – could affect eligibility later for a particular allocation of property.

1. Which is specifically recommended by the Secretary of State in the English Code, para 3.2.

3.203 If there is no change of circumstances between the first and second checks, but the local housing authority simply reaches a different conclusion which is adverse to the applicant – perhaps because the decision-maker takes a different view of the facts, or material factors were previously overlooked – then the applicant may be able to challenge this second, unfavourable, decision. In the homelessness context, it has been held that a local housing authority cannot revisit a decision that the applicant was eligible where there had been no fraud or deception on the part of the applicant and no fundamental mistake of fact. Further, the applicant may be able to show that he or she has a legitimate expectation arising from the first decision.

2. The issue of ‘legitimate expectation’ arises where a person is, contrary to his or her expectations, deprived ‘. . . of some benefit or advantage which either (i) he had in the past been permitted by the decision-maker to enjoy and which he can legitimately expect to be permitted to continue to do until there has been communicated to him some rational grounds for withdrawing it or on which he has been given an opportunity to comment; or (ii) he has received assurance from the decision-maker that they will not be withdrawn without giving him first an opportunity of advancing reasons for contending that they should not be withdrawn*: Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service [1985] AC 374, HL per Lord Diplock at 408. See also R v North and East Devon Health Authority ex p Coughlan [2001] QB 213, CA, and R (Bhatt Murphy (a firm)) v The Independent Assessor [2008] EWCA Civ 755, CA. For a recent discussion of these cases in the context of housing allocation see R (Alansi) v Newham London Borough Council [2013] EWHC 3722 (Admin), [2014] HLR 25, Admin Ct, in which Stuart-Smith J held that ‘the test to be applied is whether frustrating the claimant’s expectation is so unfair that to take a new and different course will amount to an abuse of power’ (at [35]).

NOTIFICATION OF DECISIONS AND RIGHTS TO REVIEW

3.204 All applicants who have been found ineligible (whether on grounds of immigration status or of past misconduct) should have the right under the local allocation scheme to written notification of that decision and of the grounds.
Notification of decisions and rights to review 3.207 for it¹. The grounds must be firmly ‘based on the relevant facts of the case’². The applicant should also have the right under that scheme to request a review of that decision, and to be informed of the review decision and the grounds on which it was made¹. The reviewer should reconsider afresh the whole of the information put before him or her, and consider the facts as at the date of the review decision¹. As to the procedure to be followed on the review, see 2.94–2.99. The Welsh Code contains extensive guidance as to how a review of a decision on eligibility should be organised and conducted to ensure procedural fairness⁵.

2 English Code, para 5.16 and Welsh Code, para 2.51.

4 English Code, para 5.19v.
5 Welsh Code, para 2.55.

3.205 In relation to a decision that an applicant to a local housing authority in England is not a ‘qualifying person’ there should be a similar right in the local allocation scheme for that person to be given written notice of the decision and of the grounds for it¹. It is to be hoped that there will be no return to the practices, adopted in some areas from 1996–2003, of deflecting genuine applicants to local housing authorities at their first point of contact by telling them (in person or over the telephone) that they do not meet the local qualifying conditions or that they fall within a class that does not qualify and therefore should not apply. An applicant dissatisfied with such a decision should have the right to request a review of that decision, and to be informed of the review decision and the grounds on which it was made².

2 HA 1996, s 166A(9)(c).

3.206 If the review upholds the original decision in any case relating to eligibility or qualification, there is no mechanism to appeal to the county court and the only available legal challenge to the review decision is by judicial review, alleging an error of law in the review process, in the tests applied by the local housing authority in reaching its decision on review, or in the review decision itself¹. Further information on challenging review decisions is given at 2.103–2.120.

3.207 Eligibility and Qualification for Allocation

RENEWED APPLICATIONS

3.208 The decision reached by a local housing authority on an applicant’s eligibility (whether on immigration-related grounds or behaviour-related grounds) or whether he or she is a qualifying person does not bind any other local housing authority to reach the same decision. Disappointed applicants unable to overturn the adverse decision may be advised to apply elsewhere. In England that is particularly true of decisions relating to qualification because every local housing authority in England will have adopted different qualifying classes and criteria.

3.209 Alternatively, the applicant could make a further application to the same local housing authority. Plainly, a person who has been declared ineligible on immigration-related grounds will wish to apply again, as soon as his or her immigration status alters.

1 See 2.73–2.74 on ‘Repeat Applications’.

Wales

3.210 HA 1996, Pt 6 expressly envisages that an applicant found to be ineligible by a local housing authority in Wales on behaviour-related eligibility grounds may want to re-apply on the basis that he or she should no longer be treated as ineligible. It provides for the making of ‘a fresh application’ in such cases. This is no doubt because the two statutory conditions for ineligibility in the behaviour category link past misconduct and present suitability to be a tenant.

1 HA 1996, s 160A(11).

3.211 Inevitably, that link will become weaker with the passage of time and with other changes in an applicant’s circumstances. The Welsh Code suggests that the burden will be on the applicant to show that his or her circumstances or behaviour have changed.

1 Welsh Code, para 2.40.

England

3.212 An applicant who has received a decision from a local housing authority in England that he or she does not qualify can re-apply if he or she considers that he or she should be treated as a qualifying person. The most obvious example will be where the initial application was made at the time when the applicant was unemployed and the local qualifying class was ‘persons in employment’. The applicant may re-apply as soon as he or she obtains employment. Similarly, a person caught by a residency requirement may re-apply on accruing the requisite period of residence. The statutory guidance suggests that on any re-application it would be for the applicant to show that his or her circumstances have changed. However, there is no need for there to have been any change of personal circumstances – the local housing authority may simply have changed its qualifying criteria.

INTRODUCTION

4.1 Each local housing authority in England and Wales is required by the Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996), Pt 6 (‘Allocation of Housing Accommodation’), to have a scheme for the allocation of social housing. Even those local housing authorities which have transferred the whole of their housing stock, and no longer have any properties to let, are required to have an allocation scheme, not least because they retain nomination rights (to other local housing authorities and to non-local authority social landlords) and the exercise of those nomination rights constitutes an ‘allocation’. The obligation to have an allocation scheme remains in place even if the local housing authority has contracted out delivery of its allocation functions. However, research has found that several local housing authorities in England, which had transferred their housing stock to private registered providers, perceived themselves as 'retaining no such role'.

2 English Code, para 4.2; Welsh Code, Annex 9.

3 Exploring local authority policy and practice on housing allocations (DCLG, July 2009) para 2.15.

4.2 This chapter discusses how these local housing allocation schemes must be framed (whether from the outset or by amendment) in order to comply with HA 1996, Pt 6 and how they must work to enable a lawful assessment of each applicant’s application. The process of actual allocation to those who have had their applications assessed is reviewed in the next chapter. HA 1996, Pt 6, states that everything that counts as an ‘allocation’ must be undertaken in accordance with the local allocation scheme or it will be unlawful. As long as a local housing authority complies with the basic requirements set out in this chapter, it is allowed to exercise its own discretion in setting on a scheme for determining how it actually makes allocations and to whom.

1 For the definition see HA 1996, s 159(2); and see also the discussion at 1.23–1.27 of circumstances in which a person can become a tenant of social housing without an allocation.

ADOPTING OR AMENDING AN ALLOCATION SCHEME

Adopting a scheme

4.3 Most local housing authorities will have long since adopted an allocation scheme, as required by HA 1996, Pt 6, as amended. But some new local housing authorities are from time to time created (eg by establishing new unitary authorities in areas with multiple layers of local government). Where a new local authority has been established as a local housing authority for a district it will need to formulate and adopt an allocation scheme. There are two essential statutory pre-requisites before any new local allocation scheme can be adopted.

4.4 The first is that the local housing authority must undertake any impact assessments required under equalities legislation and by the local housing authority’s own statements of equality policy.

1 See 4.193–4.209.

4.5 The second requirement is one of limited consultation. Before an allocation scheme is adopted, the local housing authority is required to consult every private registered provider (or, in Wales, every registered social landlord) with which it has nomination arrangements. As part of that consultation, it must send those landlords a copy of the draft scheme and give them a reasonable opportunity to comment on the proposals. A reasonable opportunity is identified in the Welsh Code as being a minimum period of 12 weeks.
Adopting or amending an allocation scheme 4.9

1 HAA 1996, s 166A(13) (England) and s 167(7) (Wales).

4.6 These, of course, are the minimum statutory prerequisites. A local housing authority drawing up a scheme for the first time might well be expected to undertake a much wider range of measures before finally adopting its scheme. There is no statutory requirement to consult any other people or organisations before adopting a scheme, but much might usefully be gained by eliciting the views of local tenants’ organisations, housing advice agencies and the like. The Welsh Code advises that any such consultation should be broad based and should use a variety of methods to ensure that it is representative and that it addresses the needs of people with protected characteristics. It also recommends that local health boards, Supporting People teams, relevant voluntary sector organisations and other recognised referral bodies should be consulted.

1 Welsh Code, para 4.27. For the ‘protected characteristics’ see Equality Act 2012, ss 5–12.

4.7 Indeed, local housing authorities may wish to engage with and involve all interested groups and the wider community before they produce their first allocation scheme so that local people are given the opportunity to contribute to the development of the allocation priorities. The Chartered Institute of Housing has suggested that ‘allocation’ schemes should be developed in consultation with local registered providers, partners working in health and the local economy and tenants, residents and communities themselves.

1 Welsh Code, para 4.29.

4.8 A local housing authority should take into account the findings and conclusions of its own homelessness review and strategy when settling upon an allocation scheme and, conversely, the homelessness strategy should take into account the local allocation scheme. Indeed, if a local housing authority in England is preparing an allocation scheme it must have regard to:

(1) its homelessness strategy;
(2) its tenancy strategy; and
(3) (if it is a local housing authority in London) the London housing strategy.

element of the local Single Integrated Plan¹.

4.10 The content and degree of detail required in the finished scheme is considered later in this chapter¹.

Amending the current local allocation scheme

4.11 There is no statutory obligation on a local housing authority to keep the terms of its allocation scheme under review or to revise it regularly¹. However, the Welsh Code suggests that it would be ‘good practice’ to review allocation policies at least every two years². The English Homelessness Code of Guidance encourages local housing authorities to ‘keep under review the impact of their allocations policies upon people at risk of homelessness’.³ Further, review or revision of an allocation scheme may be prompted by a number of different factors.

(1) If a court declares the whole or a part of a housing allocation scheme to be unlawful the local housing authority will need to replace or vary its scheme⁴.

(2) A court’s decision in respect of a different local housing authority may also be relevant. The Local Government Ombudsman (LGO)⁵ has said ‘we would criticise a local housing authority for failing to review its housing allocation scheme in response to a court judgement [sic] against a different authority that raises an issue which is clearly relevant to the authority’s own scheme’⁶.

(3) An event affecting the housing situation in a local housing authority’s area may prompt an amendment to its scheme. In 2017, after the devastating fire at Grenfell Tower in London, which destroyed 129 flats and took 72 lives, the local housing authority concerned adopted an exceptional rehousing policy for those affected.

(4) A significant change in legislation is also likely to require review and, if necessary, revision of an allocation scheme. Since June 2012, all local housing authorities in England were expected to undertake reviews of, and make possible amendments to, their allocation schemes in the light of the changes to HA 1996, Pt 6, made by the Localism Act 2011⁷. The revision of allocation schemes in England has been positively promoted by the Supplementary English Code⁸ which particularly encourages revisions to adopt or change classes of qualifying and non-qualifying applicants. This guidance appears to have been followed as, since the Localism Act 2011 came into effect, 95% of local authorities have reported changing their waiting list criteria due to the new legislation⁹.

In addition, the English Homelessness Code of Guidance states that local housing authorities may need to review their allocation schemes in response to the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017,¹⁰ in order to ‘ensure that they deliver the requirements of the legislation and are sufficiently geared towards preventing homelessness’.¹¹
(5) In Wales, there will have been a need to review local allocation schemes to take account of the new national guidance on local housing allocation published in the Welsh Code in March 2016. If a local housing authority proposes to make any significant change to the local allocation scheme, two sets of statutory requirements are triggered.

2. And to review published information about them annually, see Welsh Code para 3.83 and 4.52.

4. An application by the local housing authority for permission to appeal from such a declaration does not operate as an automatic ‘stay’ of that requirement. Either an application for a stay must be made to the appellate court or the local housing authority must adopt a new or modified scheme – even if an interim one: R(HA) v Ealing London Borough Council (No 2) [2015] EWHC 4108 (Admin), [2016] February Legal Action p 44, Admin Ct.

5. As of 19 June 2017, the Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman (LGSCO).

7. The major change made by the Localism Act 2011 is discussed at para 3.91.

10. This substantially amends Part 7 of the Housing Act 1996 with respect to applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after from 3 April 2018.

12. See the Welsh Code.

4.12 First, the local housing authority will need to make any impact assessment necessary to achieve compliance with the requirements of equalities legislation and with its own equality policies. See 4.192–4.230.

4.13 Second, if an alteration is to be made which amounts to ‘a major change of policy’, the local housing authority is required to notify and consult with local private registered providers (or, in Wales, registered social landlords) with which it has nomination arrangements and give them a reasonable opportunity to comment on the proposed changes. A minimum consultation period of 12 weeks is recommended.

1. HA 1996, s 166A(13) (England), s 167(7) (Wales).

4.14 But what is ‘a major change of policy’? The Welsh Code advises that ‘a major change of policy’ for these purposes would include any amendment affecting the relative priority of a large number of people being considered for an allocation of social housing, and any significant alteration to allocation procedures. In a case concerning Brent London Borough Council, the LGO decided that a change in policy under which working applicants were awarded an additional five years’ priority constituted a major change of policy.

4.14 Allocation Schemes

3 Complaint against London Borough of Brent, 16 010 013, 24 March 2017.

4.15 The question was considered by the Court of Appeal in R (A) v Lambeth London Borough Council. The court was concerned with Lambeth’s decision to change the proportions of allocations (‘quotas’) made available to different groups within its scheme, so that three of the seven groups would receive no allocations whatsoever. Arguably, this constituted ‘a major change of policy’, certainly as far as the applicants in those three groups were concerned. The prospects of any of them receiving an allocation had suddenly become ‘zero’. The allocation scheme itself did not refer to the quotas of allocations that each group could expect, merely stating ‘the effect of preference on each applicant group is also reviewed, and targets changed if necessary’. The Court of Appeal, whilst holding that other aspects of the scheme were unlawful, held that since the actual proportion of allocations between the different groups was not part of the published scheme, and there was no requirement for it to be published, a change in the proportion did not constitute ‘a major change of policy’ and there was no need to consult or inform applicants. It follows that ‘a major change of policy’ must at least be a change relating to the information which is contained, or should be contained, in the published allocation scheme.

2 See 5.34.

4.16 Until recently, the most commonly proposed ‘major change of policy’ was either a shift from officer-led allocation to the adoption of at least some choice-based element in an allocation scheme or the complete replacement of the previous arrangements with a wholly choice-based letting scheme.

4.17 The broadest possible approach should be taken to involving the local community in consultation on the variation of any allocation scheme. The Welsh Code suggests that anyone who is affected by or interested in the way social housing is allocated should be included when consulting on changes to an allocation scheme and local housing authorities in Wales are encouraged to engage with a wide range of stakeholders in the statutory, voluntary and community sectors, as well as applicants and the general public. In any event, a local housing authority which is also a social landlord will also need to comply with the requirements of its own statutory scheme for consulting current tenants and with the statutory regulator’s expectations as to consultation with, and participation by, tenants in respect of major changes of policy.

1 Welsh Code, paras 3.60 and 4.28–4.33.
2 Welsh Code, paras 3.60 and 4.28–4.33.
3 Housing Act 1985, s 105.
4 For example, the Tenant Involvement and Empowerment Standard (updated in July 2017), part of The regulatory framework for social housing in England from April 2015 (Homes and Communities Agency, March 2015), requires that ‘Registered providers shall ensure that tenants are given a wide range of opportunities to influence and be involved . . . in the formulation of their landlord’s housing related policies and strategic priorities’.

4.18 If an alteration is made which reflects a ‘major change of policy’, the local housing authority must take such steps as it considers reasonable to bring the effects of the change to the attention of those likely to be affected by it. Most obviously, that will be the pool of actual or prospective applicants and those likely to be advising them. Very little guidance is given in the Codes as to what steps might be considered ‘reasonable’. The Welsh Code suggests that a major policy change will require ‘each potential applicant to be informed personally by letter’, leaving unanswered the question as to how a local housing authority can identify potential, as opposed to actual, applicants.\(^2\)

4.19 Plainly, those applicants already being dealt with under the current allocation scheme can be directly written to.\(^1\) However, potential applicants and other members of the public will have to be informed through the usual information mechanisms available to the local housing authority, such as publication on the website, notice in the local newspapers, informing housing advice agencies, etc. Given that some existing tenants of social housing who are seeking transfers will fall within the allocation scheme arrangements, and would therefore be likely to be affected, arguably the local housing authority should inform all social housing tenants and tenants’ organisations in its district of any ‘major change of policy’ to be reflected in the revised allocation scheme.

\(^1\) In \textit{R (Alansi) v Newham London Borough Council} [2013] EWHC 3722(Admin), [2014] HLR 25, Admin Ct the local housing authority proposed a revision of its allocation scheme which, among other matters, would remove one particular group of applicants from a ‘reasonable preference’ category. The council wrote to every current applicant, consulting them on the proposed changes. When the particular change had been made, it wrote to each applicant in the group affected, inviting the provision of any new or additional information and providing the opportunity of a review.

4.20 One of the most difficult aspects of adopting extensive amendments to a local housing allocation scheme is the need to deal with those applicants who have already been considered and assessed under the old scheme. This should be made clear in the scheme, but in the absence of any such provision, the assumption would be that the requirements of the amended scheme would apply immediately to all applicants.

4.21 In September 2005 a local housing authority in London changed its housing allocation scheme from being points-based to one using wholly new assessment bands in which priority operated by reference to registration dates. The new scheme did not address how applicants registered on the old scheme would be dealt with under the new one. The Court of Appeal declined to fill that gap, holding that it was ‘questionable’ on what basis the local housing authority could give any applicant a registration date under the new scheme earlier than the date of the adoption of the new scheme – while also indicating that if any such provision was to be made, it should be published as part of the revised allocation scheme.\(^1\)

\(^1\) \textit{R (Faarah) v Southwark London Borough Council} [2008] EWCA Civ 807, [2009] HLR 12, CA.

ENSURING THAT THE SCHEME IS SUFFICIENTLY DETAILED

4.22 HA 1996, Pt 6, prescribes that the new local housing allocation scheme must set out:
4.22 Allocation Schemes

(1) how the local housing authority will determine priorities between applicants; and
(2) what procedures it will follow in allocating housing accommodation.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(1) (England), s 167(1) (Wales).

4.23 Where the local housing authority has adopted a choice-based letting arrangement, the formal allocation scheme ought to set out the procedures and priorities as they apply not only to the initial consideration of an applicant’s application but also to the treatment of any bid made by the applicant for specific accommodation.

4.24 Experience would suggest that local housing authorities sometimes overlook the fact that, for these purposes, ‘procedure’ includes ‘all aspects of the allocation process, including the persons or descriptions of persons by whom decisions are to be taken’.

In short, the statutory requirement is that the published scheme deals with both ‘why’ and ‘how’ allocations are made. Obviously, the statements as to who does what in the allocation process should reflect actual practice. In one case, an allocation scheme provided that particular decisions would be taken by the area housing manager and the rehousing manager jointly. A decision later taken by one of those officers, acting alone, was outside the terms of the scheme and was, accordingly, unlawful.

4.25 The courts have not taken an altogether consistent line as to how much detail, on the prioritisation of applications or the procedures to be followed in processing them, is required in a local allocation scheme. The range of approaches taken by the courts is illustrated by the following examples:

- A scheme which did ‘not explain what criteria apply or indicate that they will be applied’ was held to be unlawful in that respect.
- An allocation scheme provided for nominations by social services but did not explain what sort of communication from what part of social services would qualify as such a nomination. That was insufficient.
- A scheme enabled an applicant to obtain substantially increased points if he was imminently required to give up accommodation leased from the private sector. It wrongly failed to indicate precisely at what stage the extra points would accrue.
- A local housing authority had adopted targets for achieving allocations to particular classes of applicant. The targets were not part of the procedure of the scheme, so the scheme did not need to be amended each time they were changed.
- On a challenge to the sufficiency of detail in a local housing authority’s scheme, in respect of allocation to particular priority groups, a judge said:
  ‘The scheme must set out all aspects of the allocation process but it is not necessary to do more than . . . explain what criteria apply to each group and to indicate that an officer will allocate in accordance with those criteria which may be general.’

Ensuring that the scheme is sufficiently detailed 4.26

- An allocation scheme which was already ‘very long and detailed’ did not set out the precise criteria under which applicants in medical need were to be admitted to a particular priority category. That level of detail did not need to be added to the scheme.

- A local housing authority operated a policy whereby, at shortlisting stage, bidders from the same bands would have the presence (or otherwise) of a local connection taken into account. The policy was not initially mentioned in the published allocation scheme but was added on a later revision. The court held that the matter was one of minor detail, the omission of which was not unlawful.

- It was implicit in a local housing authority’s scheme that direct offers would only be made to applicants with at least 120 points. However, it emerged during the hearing that in practice offers would be made to applicants with only 100 points. This was not ascertainable from the scheme and there was nothing in the scheme to indicate what criteria were used to make direct offers. The scheme was unlawful in this regard.

8 R (C) v Islington London Borough Council [2017] EWHC 1288 (Admin), [2017] HLR 32, Admin Ct at [56]–[63].

4.26 A particular issue has been the extent to which the local allocation scheme must be a comprehensive document, containing all aspects and details of the scheme, or whether it can include material by reference to other documents. Some allocation schemes simply set out broad policy statements, unlawfully leaving the mechanics to be detailed in unpublished procedure manuals or staff training materials. However, it seems that if the allocation scheme refers to relevant details to be found in another published document, the failure to include that material in the allocation scheme itself may not be unlawful. In one case, the Introduction to the published scheme said that it had to be read in connection with the annual and mid-year reports made to the council by the cabinet member with responsibility for housing, which were published on the internet. Responding to an assertion that that did not meet the statutory requirements the judge said ‘[i]t may be cumbersome to have to look at two (and possibly more) documents, but it is not unlawful’. In refusing permission to appeal against that decision, another judge said: ‘The mere proposition that it [publication in one place] might be more transparent is not sufficient to establish unlawfulness’.

DETERMINING PRIORITY FOR ALLOCATION – REASONABLE PREFERENCE CLASSES

4.27 The primary function (and requirement) of a local allocation scheme is that it sets out the local housing authority’s priorities in allocating housing accommodation. It represents the local housing authority’s policy choices about discrimination between applicants. It sets out which applicants are to have more priority than others and, where priorities are broadly evenly matched, which applicant is to be preferred. The scheme needs to explain to those operating it, or advising about it, the circumstances in which Applicant A will have greater or lesser preference than Applicant B.

4.28 HA 1996, Pt 6, leaves a local housing authority free to adopt its own locally agreed policies and principles, subject to the terms of HA 1996, Pt 6 itself (and to any regulations made under HA 1996, Pt 6)\(^1\). Of course, although the whole process is one of discrimination about access to services, any unlawful discrimination is to be avoided\(^2\). The most significant constraint on the local housing authority’s freedom to select particular applicants is the requirement that the scheme must be framed to give a preference to those groups of applicants set out in HA 1996, Pt 6.

Giving a ‘reasonable preference’

4.29 In relation to prioritisation between applicants, HA 1996, Pt 6, states that every local allocation scheme must be drawn up so as secure a ‘reasonable preference’ for the groups of people specified in HA 1996, Pt 6\(^1\). Local housing authorities must design and operate schemes that broadly comply with the statutory list. This does not mean that the local allocation scheme must adopt precisely the same text as that given in HA 1996, Pt 6. All that is required is that the local scheme does actually give a reasonable preference to applicants falling into one or more of the statutory groups. The statutory list contains five broad groups. Each of the five groups is described and discussed in detail later in the chapter\(^2\) after a consideration of what the concept of a ‘reasonable’ preference entails.

1. HA 1996, s 166A(7) (England) and s 167(3) (Wales) respectively permit the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government and the Welsh Ministers to specify further groups of people, or to amend or repeal the groups specified in HA 1996, Pt 6. Neither the Secretary of State nor the Welsh Ministers have exercised these powers.
2. See 4.54 et seq.

How much preference is ‘reasonable’?

4.30 HA 1996, Pt 6, does not require a local allocation scheme to be framed so as to accord absolute preference to those in the listed groups\(^1\). Local housing authorities need give them only a ‘reasonable preference’ in the allocation scheme. The term ‘reasonable preference’ is not new. In an early case, it was established that it requires:

‘... that positive favour should be shown to applications which satisfy any of the relevant criteria. To use colloquial language they should be given a reasonable head start.’

As the Welsh Code puts it, what is important is that an allocation scheme makes a clear distinction between those applicants who fall within the reasonable preference categories and those who do not.

4.31 However, the degree of preference that is reasonable is a matter for the discretion of the local housing authority. Provided that their allocation schemes comply with the broad statutory ‘reasonable preference’ categories, local housing authorities may otherwise decide for themselves on the principles for determining priorities in the local allocation scheme. In 2009, the House of Lords decided that the amendments made to HA 1996, Pt 6, by the Homelessness Act 2002 had given local housing authorities even greater flexibility than had previously been thought and that the statutory flexibility is such that it would be ‘impossible to argue that an authority’s allocation scheme is unlawful unless the basis on which it accords priority as between those applicants [in the reasonable preference categories] is irrational’.

4.32 Nevertheless, despite this wide discretion, it is possible to identify a number of principles governing how reasonable preference is to be given and assessed.

4.33 First, the language of HA 1996, Pt 6, relating to ‘reasonable preference’ deals with groups of people. It does not address the relative standing of any individual applicants within an allocation scheme precisely because it only requires a ‘reasonable preference’ to be given to particular groups rather than to specific applicants.

4.34 Second, the obligation is only to give some preference, and preference ‘should not be confused with prospects of success’. It would be ‘quite possible for a lawful scheme to give reasonable preference to a person within s 167(2) and for that person never to be allocated Pt 6 housing’. A scheme which imposes a points threshold below which an applicant cannot even place a bid, even though he or she is in a reasonable preference category, may not be unlawful. However, a residence requirement which precludes a person entitled to a reasonable preference from accessing the waiting list at all may be unlawful.
4.34 Allocation Schemes

2 HA 1996, s 167 now applies only to local housing authorities in Wales. The relevant provision for local housing authorities in England is now HA 1996, s 166A.

4.35 Third, HA 1996, Pt 6 prohibits local housing authorities from adopting a scheme which awards no preference at all to a person within one of the preference groups unless:

(1) the applicant is ineligible by reason of his or her immigration status or insufficient residence in the UK;
(2) the applicant is not within a qualifying class (or is within a non-qualifying class) as defined by the local housing authority in England to which the application has been made. The qualifying case must itself, of course, be consistent with the requirement to give the specified groups reasonable preference;
(3) a local housing authority in Wales has decided that the applicant is not eligible on account of his or her past behaviour;
(4) a local housing authority in Wales has decided that the applicant is eligible but has been guilty of ‘unacceptable behaviour’ within the statutory definition of that term; or
(5) the applicant is entitled to a preference solely because he or she is in one of the first two reasonable preference categories and that category is only satisfied because of the presence in the applicant’s household of a ‘restricted person’.

1 See 3.12–3.75.
2 But see the discussion of this point at 3.136–3.148.
4 HA 1996, ss 167(2B) to (2D) applying s 160A(8); see 4.150–4.158.

4.36 Fourth, there is no requirement to give equal weight to each of the reasonable preference categories, provided that, overall, reasonable preference has been given to all of them.

1 English Code, para 4.5.

4.37 Fifth, HA 1996, Pt 6, does not require that people in the reasonable preference groups must be given preference in relation to every property which is let under the scheme. It is the scheme taken as a whole that must give a reasonable preference to the statutory groups. Accordingly, a scheme which enabled a mere 5% of its available properties to be open to bids from transfer applicants who were not in the reasonable preference categories did not fail to give those statutory priority groups a ‘reasonable’ preference overall. The difficulty is to identify the point at which allocation, to applicants without a reasonable preference, of a higher percentage of properties than 5% would prevent the scheme from giving overall priority to the reasonable preference classes. The Welsh Code suggests that the percentage used by particular local housing authorities is a matter for individual consideration of how to best meet the strategic needs of the area.
Determining priority for allocation 4.39

2 In R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council [2017] EWCA Civ 1127, [2018] HLR 2, CA an allocation scheme which reserved 20% of the available lettings for ‘working households’ and ‘model tenants’ was found to be unlawful. However, it was not challenged on the basis that it breached the obligation to give reasonable preference to the specified groups and therefore there was no discussion of its lawfulness in that respect.

3 Welsh Code, para 3.10.

4.38 Sixth, the obligation to give reasonable preference is ‘a continuing one’ and ‘in that sense is absolute and required to be complied with at all times’. Nevertheless, ‘it would be wrong to assess whether or not it is being complied with by simply taking a snapshot of the operation of the scheme on a particular day or a particular week’. The obligation does not require that reasonable preference is given ‘at all times and in relation to all properties’: it will be sufficient if reasonable preference is given ‘over the course of a reasonable period’. However, this does not mean that a scheme which suspends a reasonable preference group from bidding for a certain period of time will be lawful. In R (Alemi) v Westminster City Council, the local housing authority’s scheme provided that applicants to whom the main housing duty under HA 1996, s 193(2) had been accepted were suspended from bidding for social housing for 12 months. An argument that the scheme was lawful if assessed over a reasonable period of time was unsuccessful: the reasonable period proposed was ‘totally arbitrary’ and ‘unrelated to the statutory purpose of allocating social housing’. Further, the effect of the provision was that the applicant was wholly excluded from the potential of being allocated social housing for 12 months and therefore she had no preference at all in that period.

4 See 16.94–16.199.

6 [2015] EWHC 1765 (Admin) at [32].

4.39 Seventh, it is not necessary for an allocation scheme to provide a mechanism for cumulative or composite assessments or, put another way, for a scheme to ‘afford greater priority to applicants who fall within more than one reasonable preference category (cumulative preference) over those who have reasonable preference on a single, non-urgent basis’. While the statutory provisions enable such an approach to be adopted, they do not require it. However, the local housing authority must still consider the needs of all household members\(^5\).

2. English Code, para 4.5; Welsh Code, para 3.10.

3. Particularly the sentence in HA 1996, s 166A(3) (England) and s 167(2) (Wales) starting ‘The scheme may also be framed . . . ’ when read with the opening words of s 166A(5) (England) and s 167(2A) (Wales).

Reasonable preference: formulating the scheme

4.40 Notwithstanding the degree of flexibility thus permitted, local housing authorities must actually identify the criteria for determining priorities within their allocation schemes\(^1\). They will have to decide, for example, how to choose between applicants who fall into the different ‘reasonable preference’ categories and also how to organise people within each of those different groups (whether according to their comparative need or according to some other locally adopted criteria). The scheme will also need to address the priority to be given to applicants who are not in the reasonable preference categories at all. A scheme which did not clearly identify and define the criteria for awarding a reasonable preference was held not to comply with the requirements of HA 1996, Pt 6\(^2\). Moreover, as one judge has also said:

‘. . . it goes without saying that whatever criteria are adopted must be rational and must be related to the particular policy and housing needs . . . ’

4.41 Beyond the requirement to frame an allocation scheme to reflect the statutory list of reasonable preference groups, local housing authorities are permitted a good deal of autonomy to decide the procedures and principles they wish to apply locally. HA 1996, Pt 6 does, however, offer a steer towards other specific factors. Local housing authorities are, for example, expressly permitted to give ‘additional preference’ to people with ‘urgent housing needs’ who fall within any of the reasonable preference categories\(^3\), and to take account of such an applicant’s financial resources, his or her behaviour (good or bad), any local connection with a particular local housing authority’s area, or any other matter\(^4\). Other distinguishing factors may include:

- Nature of tenure: a scheme which prioritised overcrowded applicants living in social housing over overcrowded applicants living in private rented sector housing was not unlawful\(^5\).
- Length of time the applicant has been waiting for an allocation\(^6\): in \textit{R (Ahmad) v Newham London Borough Council}\(^7\) the House of Lords was persuaded that a scheme based on banding together those applicants in any of the reasonable preference categories and then prioritising between them by reference to waiting-time had the merit of being 'quantifiable, transparent and hard to manipulate', in contrast to schemes for the affording of relative priority by case-by-case assessment of housing need reflected in the awarding of points.
Determining priority for allocation 4.45

1 HA 1996, s 166A(3) (England), s 167(2) (Wales); see 4.113–4.118.
2 HA 1996, s 166A(5) (England), s 167(2A) (Wales); see 4.124–4.144.

4.42 ‘Need’ for housing which brings an applicant within any of the reasonable preference categories must, of course, be assessed objectively by the local housing authority. Schemes which rely upon applicants assessing their own needs have been held to be unlawful in that they run the risk of encouraging applicants to assess themselves as requiring accommodation which would in fact be unsuitable for them, in the hope of benefiting from a shorter waiting period for less desirable accommodation.

4.43 An allocation scheme could therefore be based on awarding points to applicants, or grouping applicants into bands, or both. Either method should accord some preference to those in the ‘reasonable preference’ categories. In some allocation schemes, a combination of the two methods is used. The most straightforward scheme of allocation, strict date order for all applicants, simply cannot work in the modern statutory framework, which requires some classes of applicants to be given a reasonable preference over others.

4.44 In a points-based scheme, points could be awarded to reflect different categories of need, for example for medical and welfare needs, overcrowding, etc, and further points may reflect the length of time that an applicant has been waiting for accommodation after having been accepted onto the scheme. Some have suggested that points-based systems can be complex, lacking in transparency and difficult to understand. Local housing authorities retaining such schemes have previously been encouraged to consider simplifying them.

4.45 If a banding system is adopted, applicants within each band may be prioritised by points and/or by date order, reflecting the degree of their need and/or their waiting time. The now withdrawn English (2009) Code strongly suggested this as a preferred model but the present guidance for England does not express any preference for any particular method of identifying relative priorities.

4.46 Allocation Schemes

4.46 Self-evidently, an allocation scheme that placed in the same band or group those applicants who were entitled to ‘reasonable preference’ and those who were not so entitled, and then treated the non-reasonable preference applicants equally – or even more favourably - would be unlawful\(^1\). A local housing authority must be able to distinguish between applicants who are entitled to the benefit of the ‘reasonable preference’ categories and those who are not\(^2\). A scheme which gave existing secure tenants seeking a transfer an additional 100 points each, when not all of them were entitled to a reasonable preference, was held to be unlawful because it artificially raised the points threshold to the detriment of applicants who were not existing tenants and were entitled to a statutory preference\(^3\).

\(^1\) R (A) v Lambeth London Borough Council, R (Lindsay) v Lambeth London Borough Council [2002] EWCA Civ 1084, [2002] HLR 57, CA.

4.47 An emphasis on prioritisation by combinations of ‘reasonable preference’ and the assessment of a particular household’s ‘need’\(^1\) can produce bizarre results. An applicant could be ceaselessly moving, yo-yo fashion, up and down the list of those eligible (and/or qualified) for an allocation as his or her own housing circumstances and needs change and as others apply for an allocation.

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 166A(3) (England) and s 167(2) (Wales).

4.48 For example, a household with no children may find itself almost at the top of the list of those awaiting a bed-sit or other small unit of accommodation, only to be taken towards the bottom of the list of those waiting for larger accommodation when a child arrives. One local housing authority’s scheme survived a challenge to its provision that, where the applicants’ needs had changed, so that they required a two-bedroom rather than a one-bedroom unit, they should be put at the bottom of the two-bedroom property list, and lose their points awarded for the time that they had waited on the one-bedroom property list\(^2\). Another local housing authority’s scheme had the same effect, by re-adjusting a registration date to reflect the date of a move to a new priority band, even when the extent of accommodation needed had decreased. It was nevertheless lawful\(^3\). The judge said:

‘The final resting place of the submissions advanced on behalf of Ms Kabashi was by reference to Yemlabi. In the light of Abmud, however, it is no longer tenable to contend that a scheme that provides for the alteration of effective dates when an applicant up-sizes would be rational but which does not provide for such an alteration is irrational.’

\(^1\) R (Yemlabi) v Lambeth London Borough Council [2002] EWHC 1187 (Admin), [2002] August Legal Action, p 31, Admin Ct. The court held that either scenario created injustice: if the applicants had been placed towards the top of the list for two-bedroom properties (reflecting their waiting time on the list for one-bedroom properties), those below the applicants who had a longer standing need for two-bedroom properties would rightly feel aggrieved.
Determining priority for allocation 4.51

4.49 Similarly, in any scheme based on housing need, a household provided with temporary accommodation under HA 1996, Pt 71 (Homelessness: England)2 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 (Homelessness: Wales)3 may find that the prospects of securing an early allocation under HA 1996, Pt 6 actually diminish if the household is moved to a higher standard of self-contained temporary accommodation. In one case considered by the LGO4, a homeless couple rejected temporary accommodation from the local housing authority precisely because its superior quality was such that they would fall into a lower priority category under the allocation scheme if they accepted it5.

Reasonable preference and legitimate expectation

4.50 There is one form of prioritisation not accorded by HA 1996, Pt 6, and which does not turn on ‘need’. It arises where applicants have been given a ‘legitimate expectation’ that they will be allocated local housing authority tenancies, or nominated to a private registered provider or registered social landlord1.

1 The issue of ‘legitimate expectation’ arises where a person is, contrary to his or her expectations, deprived: ‘... of some benefit or advantage which either (i) he had in the past been permitted by the decision-maker to enjoy and which he can legitimately expect to be permitted to continue to do until there has been communicated to him some rational grounds for withdrawing it on which he has been given an opportunity to comment; or (ii) he has received assurance from the decision-maker that they will not be withdrawn without giving him first an opportunity of advancing reasons for contending that they should not be withdrawn': Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service [1985] AC 374, HL per Lord Diplock at 408. See also R v North and East Devon Health Authority ex p Coughlan [2001] QB 213, CA, and R (Bhatt Murphy (a firm)) v The Independent Assessor [2008] EWCA Civ 755, CA. For a discussion of ‘legitimate expectation’ in an allocation context see R v Brent London Borough Council ex p Jerke CO/2069/97 (unreported) 8 May 1998, QBD; R v Lambeth London Borough Council ex p Trabi (1998) 30 HLR 975, QBD; R (Tout a Tout) v Haringey London Borough Council [2012] EWHC 873 (Admin), (2012) May Legal Action, p 39, Admin Ct; and R (Alansi) v Newham London Borough Council [2013] EWHC 3722 (Admin), [2014] HLR 25, Admin Ct.

4.51 Such an expectation may be difficult to establish. No ‘legitimate expectation’ argument is likely to succeed simply where there has been a failure in communication’ or where the applicant has not relied on the representation2. Even where there has been a clear and unambiguous representation on which the applicant has relied, that will not be sufficient: the question is whether frustrating that expectation would be so unfair that to take a different course would be an abuse of power3. Findings that the local housing authority’s conduct amounts or would amount to an abuse of power are likely to be...

rare. Decisions about housing allocations have been held to fall within the realm of ‘macro’ policy making where:

‘. . . . the court should be cautious before substituting its own judgment for that of the democratically elected local authority about what is the appropriate balance to strike and when and to what extent it is proportionate to affect individual interests adversely in striking that balance’.1

4.52 However, the possibility of such an expectation being generated cannot be entirely ruled out. A ‘legitimate expectation’ of this type arose where homeless applicants, who had been accepted as such under the Housing Act 1985, Pt 3, were told that they would be given a local housing authority or housing association tenancy in performance of the homelessness duty1. It may also arise where a local housing authority has announced a policy of giving carers the right to take over tenancies on the death of tenants for whom they were caring.

4.53 The local housing authority must therefore make provision for such an eventuality in its allocation scheme so that such applicants receive points or are placed in a specific band in order to take account of those expectations1. Of course, an allocation scheme may subsequently be altered (provided the procedures described above, for amending a scheme, are properly followed) so as to remove a preference or priority that a particular applicant or class of applicants had a ‘legitimate expectation’ of receiving2.

The ‘reasonable preference’ groups

4.54 Five groups of people must be accorded a ‘reasonable preference’ in housing allocation schemes framed under HA 1996, Pt 6. They are:

(1) people who are ‘homeless’, within the meaning of either HA 1996, Pt 7; (England) or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 (Wales);2

(2) people who are owed a particular statutory duty by any local housing authority under certain provisions of homelessness legislation;

(3) people occupying insanitary or overcrowded housing or otherwise living in unsatisfactory housing conditions;
Determining priority for allocation

4.56

(4) people who need to move on medical or welfare grounds, including (in England) grounds relating to a disability; and

(5) people who need to move to a particular locality in the district of the local housing authority, where failure to meet that need would cause hardship, to themselves or to others.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 See Chapter 10.

3 In England, the relevant duties are those set out in HA 1996, s 190(2) (as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(5) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018), s 193(2) and s 195(2) (as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018). The equivalent duties under the Housing Act 1985 (HA 1985) were set out in HA 1985 s 65(2) and s 68(2)). HA 1996, s 190(2) and s 193(2) contain the accommodation duties owed to applicants with a priority need which arise once the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) has come to an end. HA 1996, s 195(2) contains the prevention duty owed to all applicants who are eligible and threatened with homelessness. See Chapters 15 and 16. In Wales, this reasonable preference category covers ‘people who are owed any duty by a local housing authority under H(W)Act 2014, ss 66, 73 or 75’: HA 1996, s 167(2)(b) as amended by H(W)A 2014, s 100 and Sch 3, para 3. See Chapter 17.

4 HA 1996, s 166A(3)(d) (England) and s 167(2)(d) (Wales) prospectively amended by Housing Act 2004, s 223, adding ‘(including grounds relating to a disability)’ but yet to be brought into force in Wales.

5 HA 1996, s 166A(3) (England), s 167(2) (Wales).

4.55 The list may be extended or reduced by ministerial regulations without the need for primary legislation. No such regulations have been made since that power was enacted.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(7) (England), s 167(3) (Wales).

4.56 Each of the present five categories entitled to ‘reasonable preference’ requires detailed and careful consideration (offered in the next sections of this chapter) but it will be readily appreciated that some of the categories are very broadly expressed. The result is that a huge number of applicants will be covered by at least one ‘reasonable preference’ category. In 2016–17 there were 479,000 households on local housing authority waiting lists in England who were within those categories. The largest reasonable preference group was ‘People occupying insanitary or overcrowded housing or otherwise living in unsatisfactory housing conditions’, which covered 250,600 households. The second largest group was ‘People who need to move on medical or welfare grounds, including grounds relating to a disability’, which covered 108,900 households. These groups have been the largest and second largest groups since 2013. The reasonable preference category applicants therefore formed a little under half of the total of 1.16 million households on local housing authority waiting lists in England but that proportion varies wildly between regions and particular local authorities. In some metropolitan areas, and in particular in inner London, almost all applicants qualifying for consideration for an allocation are likely to be in one – or several – of the reasonable preference categories.

4.57 A person who comes within a ‘reasonable preference’ category may, if the local scheme so provides, obtain ‘additional preference’ if they have ‘urgent housing needs’.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(3). See 4.113–4.118.

People who are ‘homeless’

4.58 ‘Homelessness’ is a concept defined in England by HA 1996, Pt 72 and in Wales by H(W)A 2014, Pt 23. Under those definitions, a person is homeless if he or she has no accommodation available for his or her occupation, in the UK or elsewhere, which he or she is entitled to occupy:

1 by virtue of an interest in it;
2 because of an order of a court;
3 by an express or implied licence to occupy;
4 by virtue of an enactment or rule of law giving him or her the right to remain in occupation; or 5 by reason of a restriction on the right of another person to obtain possession4.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(3)(a) (England), s 167(2)(a) (Wales).
2 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
3 HA 1996, ss 175–177 and H(W)A 2014, ss 55–58; see Chapter 10 of this book.

4.59 A person who has somewhere to live is therefore ‘homeless’ unless he or she has at least one of these forms of entitlement to occupy – so a person living in a squat is ‘homeless’.

4.60 A person is also homeless if he or she has a right to occupy accommodation but cannot secure entry to it, or it is not available, or it is not reasonable for him or her to continue to occupy it5. Accommodation is only regarded as ‘available’ if it is available to be occupied by all the members of the applicant’s family who normally reside with him or her, and also by any other person who might reasonably be expected to reside with him or her6. Occupiers of caravans, mobile homes, and houseboats are homeless if they have no place where they are permitted both to place and to reside in their vehicle or vessel7. In October 2017, the UK Government stated its belief that people who were living in a refuge to escape domestic abuse were homeless, as it would not be reasonable for them to continue to occupy that accommodation on a long-term basis8. It proposed to issue guidance making clear the circumstances in which local housing authorities would be expect to apply this category to victims of domestic abuse who were living in refuges9. This guidance if issued will apply to local housing authorities in England only.

Determining priority for allocation 4.62

4.61 To fall within the definition of ‘homeless’, an applicant need not have made an application for homelessness assistance to any local housing authority, let alone have received a decision on such an application. Indeed, the Welsh Code explicitly states that in no circumstances should allocation practices encourage the view that people have to apply as homeless to the local housing authority in order to obtain a tenancy of social housing1. The assessment of whether the applicant is ‘homeless’ will need to be made by the local housing authority to which the application for an allocation has been directed2. A person who has already applied to a local housing authority as ‘homeless’, has been accepted as such and has then been provided with accommodation in compliance with that local housing authority’s duty may in consequence have ceased to be ‘homeless’ (and thus would normally fall within the second reasonable preference category – category (2), which specifically deals with those formerly homeless persons owed housing duties)3. In one case, however, it was rightly conceded that a person provided with interim accommodation by a local housing authority pending the determination of an application for homelessness assistance remained ‘homeless’, for the purposes of this reasonable preference category, while in that accommodation4.

1 Welsh Code, para 12.20.
2 An applicant for social housing accommodation who gives the local housing authority sufficient reason to believe that she or he may be homeless must also be dealt with under the homelessness provisions in HA 1996, Pt 7 (England) (as amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 (Wales). See 4.67–4.79.
3 See 4.67–4.79.

4.62 To obtain a ‘reasonable preference’ under the ‘homeless’ category, applicants need not have a ‘priority need’1. Nor should the local housing authority consider whether or not applicants have become homeless intentionally2. These issues are relevant only to the question of what further duty, if any, is owed following the end of the HA 1996, s 189B(2)3 relief duty4. Regardless of priority need or intentional homelessness, all homeless people fall within this reasonable preference category5 – even those who are not entitled to, for example, the final main housing duty under the statutory provisions for homelessness assistance because they have no priority need6.

1 English Code, para 4.4(a). See Chapter 12 of this book for the definition of ‘priority need’.
2 English Code, para 4.4(a). See Chapter 13 of this book for the definition of ‘becoming homeless intentionally’.
3 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
4 Although where there is reason to believe an applicant may have a priority need (and may be homeless and eligible for assistance), the local housing authority will be under a duty to provide interim accommodation: HA 1996, s 188 (as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) and H(W)A 2014, s 68.
4.62 Allocation Schemes

Applicants who are ‘threatened with homelessness’ (defined in HA 1996, s 175(4) and (5) (England) (as amended by HRA 2017, s 1(2) and (3) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) and H(W)A 2014, s 55(4)) will not fall within the category until they are actually homeless.

4.63 Precisely because statutory homelessness duties provide a safety net to pick up and accommodate those who are in priority need and are unintentionally homeless, this first category of ‘reasonable preference’ works to ensure that all other homeless people also secure a reasonable preference in allocation: those other homeless people being fit and healthy individuals, couples without children, those who have become homeless intentionally, etc.

4.64 The policy behind HA 1996, Pt 6, is therefore unashamedly to ensure that every allocation scheme is open to, and gives preference to, those who are homeless for any reason and in any circumstances. It is intended to ‘include rough sleepers and all others who do not have a home, for whatever reason’.

4.65 Indeed, in Wales, the statutory guidance goes further than a strict reading of HA 1996, Pt 6, requires and suggests that local housing authorities define homelessness for these purposes as arising ‘where a person lacks accommodation or where their tenure is not secure’. This approach, unlike the statutory definition, includes persons who are threatened with homelessness and those who have no suitable alternative accommodation, whether they are leaving institutions, required to leave by family or friends or due to relationship breakdown, or facing a possession order. When deciding whether or not a person is ‘homeless’ for these purposes, Welsh local housing authorities must have regard to the Welsh Code’s more generous approach, although it is expressly recognised to be guidance which is ‘broader’ than the legal definition.

Welsh Code, para 5.22.

Welsh Code, para 5.22, giving examples of people who are living in insecure/temporary housing, are subject to possession proceedings, or are under the threat of eviction, as people whose tenure is not secure.

Welsh Code, para 5.22. HA 1996, s 167(2)(a) (Wales) provides that to get within the first category of ‘reasonable preference’ the person must be homeless ‘within the meaning of’ H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

4.66 A person in this first ‘reasonable preference’ category may, if the local scheme so provides, also obtain ‘additional preference’ if his or her housing needs are ‘urgent’ or if he or she also falls into another of the preference categories. A person who would otherwise be in this first ‘reasonable preference’ category will not in fact be entitled to benefit from it if the only reason he or she comes within it is because regard has been had to a ‘restricted person’ in determining his or her application. The remaining four categories deal with applicants who already have accommodation.

See 4.113–4.118.

Although this is not mandatory: see 4.39.

People who are owed certain homelessness duties

4.67 This category encompasses applicants for an allocation of social housing who have already applied to a local housing authority for homelessness assistance and have received a decision that a local housing authority owes them a relevant duty. The relevant duties are specified differently in England and in Wales.

4.68 In England, the relevant duties are the following duties as set out in HA 1996, Pt 7:

1. The main housing duty (in HA 1996, s 193(2)). Prior to its amendment by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017), this applied where a person was homeless, eligible, had a priority need, and did not become homeless intentionally. As amended, it applies where a person is homeless, eligible, has a priority need, did not become homeless intentionally, and in respect of whom the local housing authority's relief duty under HA, s 189B(2), has come to an end.

2. The prevention duty (in HA 1996, s 195(2)). Prior to its amendment by the HRA 2017, this was a duty to take reasonable steps to secure that accommodation did not cease to be available for the applicant's occupation. It applied to applicants who were eligible, threatened with homelessness, had a priority need and did not become threatened with homelessness intentionally. As amended, it is a duty to take reasonable steps to help the applicant to secure that accommodation does not cease to be available for his or her occupation. It applies to all those who are threatened with homelessness and eligible. The requirements for priority need and to have been threatened with homelessness unintentionally have been dispensed with.

3. The duty to persons who became homeless intentionally (in HA 1996, s 190(2)). Prior to its amendment by the HRA 2017, this was owed to a person who was homeless, eligible, had a priority need, and became homeless intentionally. As amended, it applies to an applicant who is homeless, eligible, has a priority need, became homeless intentionally, and in respect of whom the local housing authority's relief duty under HA, s 189B(2), has come to an end.

A ‘final accommodation offer’ is defined by HA 1996, s 193A(4) and a ‘final Pt 6 offer’ is defined by HA 1996, s 193A(5). See 15.195. It will also not apply where a local housing authority has given notice to the applicant under HA 1996, s 193B(2) that they consider that the applicant has deliberately and unreasonably refused to take any step under HA 1996, s 189A (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) that he or she had agreed to take to secure suitable accommodation: HA 1996, s 193(1A) (as amended by HRA 2017, s 7(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) and s 193C(1) and (4) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018). See 15.195.

4.69 In Wales, the relevant duties are the following duties as set out in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2:

1. the relief duty (in H(W)A 2014, s 73) to help to secure that suitable accommodation is available for a person who is homeless and eligible1; or

2. the housing duty (in H(W)A 2014, s 75) to help some of those persons previously owed the s 73 duty for whom that duty ended in circumstances described in ss 74(2) or (3)2; or

3. the prevention duty (in H(W)A 2014, s 66) to help to secure that suitable accommodation does not cease to be available for occupation by a person who is threatened with homelessness and eligible3.

1 See 17.73–17.117.
2 See 17.146–17.188.
3 See 17.45–17.72.

4.70 By definition, these applicants for social housing allocation must have made applications for homelessness assistance, and have received decisions that a duty of the prescribed type is owed to them. The duty need not be owed by the same local housing authority as the local housing authority to which the applicant is applying for an allocation. So an applicant who has applied as homeless to District A, and has been placed by that local housing authority, pursuant to one of the prescribed duties, in District B might wish to apply for an allocation to the local housing authorities for both Districts A and B. He or she will have an entitlement to ‘reasonable preference’ in both the local housing authorities’ schemes.

4.71 It must be noted that the terms of this second category of ‘reasonable preference’ are very tightly drawn. They certainly do not cover all applicants who have applied to a local housing authority as homeless, nor all of those who have benefited from a duty under HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. For example, the following persons who have made applications for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in England, and are now applicants for an allocation of social housing, would fall outside the second of the ‘reasonable preference’ categories because they are not owed one of the prescribed statutory homelessness duties:

- people provided with interim accommodation because there is reason to believe they may be homeless, eligible, and have a priority need;
- people provided with accommodation pending a review of an unfavourable decision or pending an appeal;
- people accommodated pending a local connection referral;
- people who are not eligible for homelessness assistance;
- people who are owed the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty; and
- people who are owed the HA 1996, s 193C(4) final accommodation duty.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

5 HA 1996, s 185. See Chapter 11.

6 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

7 This is a duty owed to an applicant for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England who is homeless and eligible. The duty requires the local housing authority to take reasonable steps to help the applicant to secure that suitable accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation for at least six months. See 15.138–15.195.

9 This is a duty owed to an applicant for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England who is homeless intentionally, but in respect of whom the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) ended pursuant to the local housing authority giving the applicant a notice under HA 1996, s 193B (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018). A notice under HA 1996, s 193B may be given where the local housing authority considers that the applicant has deliberately and unreasonably refused to take any step under HA 1996, s 189A (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) that he or she had agreed to take or that was recorded by the authority as being reasonable for him or her to take to secure accommodation. The duty requires the local housing authority to secure that accommodation is available for occupation by the applicant. See 16.200–16.216.

4.72 Similarly, in Wales, despite the array of duties that might be owed by a local housing authority to a homeless person under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, it is only the current beneficiaries of the three specific duties identified at 4.69...
4.72 Allocation Schemes

above who obtain a ‘reasonable preference’ under this category.

See Chapter 17.

4.73 Those persons who do not fit into this second ‘reasonable preference’ category may, depending on their circumstances, fit into the first category, or into one or more of the third to fifth categories. \(^1\)

\(^1\) See 4.58–4.66 for the first category and 4.80–4.112 for the third to fifth categories.

4.74 Amendments made by the Localism Act 2011\(^1\) to HA 1996, Pt 7 allow a local housing authority in England to bring to an end the duty owed to an unintentionally homeless person in priority need (the ‘main housing duty’\(^2\)) by the making of an offer of suitable private rented sector accommodation\(^2\). A similar provision also allows a local housing authority in Wales to bring to an end the duty owed to an unintentionally homeless person in priority need by the making of an offer of suitable private rented sector accommodation\(^3\).

4.75 Several respondents to the November 2010 consultation paper on social housing, issued by the 2010–15 UK Coalition Government, noted that this change could have a considerable impact on social housing allocation to those in this preference category. To counter the possibility that some local housing authorities might, in consequence, consider it unnecessary to continue to afford the relevant applicants for homelessness assistance a reasonable preference under this category, the English Code says in terms that the category remains in place ‘notwithstanding the amendments to Pt 7 made by the Localism Act’\(^2\).

\(^1\) Local decisions: next steps towards a fairer future for social housing: Summary of responses to consultation (DCLG, February 2011), para 4.34.
\(^2\) English Code, para 4.7.

4.76 Of course, the local housing authority is entitled to discriminate (provided it does so lawfully) among those within this reasonable preference category to reflect the particular nature of the homelessness duty owed to the applicant, or the way it is being performed, or the applicant’s particular circumstances. For example, an allocation scheme may give a greater degree of preference to an applicant owed the main housing duty than to an applicant owed one of the lesser relevant housing duties.

4.77 An allocation scheme may even draw distinctions, in terms of priority, between applicants owed the same relevant homelessness duty. For example, people owed the main housing duty in England (HA 1996, s 193(2))\(^4\) and who are accommodated in good quality and stable temporary accommodation may be afforded less preference than applicants owed the same duty whose temporary accommodation will shortly become unavailable (eg because the lease from a private landlord is shortly to expire). In one local housing authority’s scheme, 10 points were awarded to applicants owed the main housing duty during the period that private sector leased accommodation was providing for them but 300 points were awarded shortly before the termination of their leases to enable the households to compete realistically for allocations at that particular time. That aspect of the scheme was perfectly lawful.

1 See 16.94–16.199.

4.78 In the same vein, the Welsh Code advises that local housing authorities in Wales which have placed homeless households in private sector leased accommodation should review the circumstances of those households at least annually. Those applicants who wish to move out of the private leased accommodation could be awarded ‘full homelessness points’ while those content to remain could have such points deferred until the lease expires.

1 Welsh Code, paras 3.43–3.44.

4.79 A person who would otherwise be in this second ‘reasonable preference’ category will not in fact be entitled to benefit from it if the only reason he or she comes within it is because regard has been had to a ‘restricted person’ in determining the application. Further, an applicant who receives ‘reasonable preference’ by being in this category remains subject to any other provisions in the local allocation scheme eg may be subject to the deferral of his or her application where suitable offers of accommodation under the allocation scheme have been made but refused.

4.80 Nothing in HA 1996, Pt 6, defines the three key adjectives in this ‘reasonable preference’ category: ‘insanitary’, ‘overcrowded’, and ‘unsatisfactory’. Nor does HA 1996, Pt 6, provide a direct link to the meanings that those words have in other legislation, even other housing legislation.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(3)(e) (England), s 167(2)(c) (Wales).

4.81 As a result, local housing authorities are largely free to develop, and incorporate into local allocation schemes, their own approach to determining the circumstances in which an applicant would fall into this ‘reasonable preference’ category.

4.82 The general law governing insanitary conditions, overcrowding, and unsatisfactory housing standards is scattered over a number of statutes. The Environmental Protection Act 1990, Pt 3 is designed to address unhealthy premises. The rules on overcrowding are set out in the Housing Act 1985, Pt 10. The law relating to hazardous housing is contained in the Housing Act 2004, Pt 1. These statutory provisions should be taken into account by local housing authorities when drawing up their criteria for admission to this third ‘reasonable preference’ category. However, local housing authorities could, and many do, adopt a more generous approach than the statutory minimum.
4.82 Allocation Schemes

Standards when operating this category.

1 See Welsh Code, para 3.30 which also refers to statutory controls on houses in multiple occupation.

4.83 For example, local housing authorities have adopted a variety of definitions of ‘overcrowding’, many of which are broader than the statutory minimum. Indeed, one judge has said that this reasonable preference category: ‘must include those who live in unsatisfactory housing conditions but need not necessarily statutorily be overcrowded’.

2 R (Ahmad) v Newham London Borough Council [2007] EWHC 2332 (Admin), (2007) November Legal Action, p 38, Admin Ct per Blake J at [64]. This part of his decision was not subject to appeal.

4.84 There are a number of possible approaches which local housing authority could adopt.

(1) Applying the statutory definition given in HA 1985, ss 324–326. Pursuant to this, a dwelling will be overcrowded if the number of people sleeping in it contravenes either the ‘room standard’ or the ‘space standard’. The room standard is breached where the number of people sleeping in a dwelling and the number of rooms available as sleeping accommodation is such that two people of the opposite sex, who are not partners, must sleep in the same room. The space standard is breached where the number of people sleeping in a dwelling exceeds the permitted number, which is calculated by reference to either the number or floor area of rooms available as sleeping accommodation.

(2) Using the Secretary of State’s bedroom standard. This is held out in the English Code as an appropriate measure of overcrowding for allocation purposes and recommended ‘as a minimum’. The bedroom standard allocates a separate bedroom to each:

• married or cohabiting couple;
• adult aged 21 years or more;
• pair of adolescents aged 10–20 years of the same sex; and
• pair of children aged under 10 years regardless of sex.

(3) Using a variant of the bedroom standard. This usually involves applying different age limits for particular occupants from those in the mainstream bedroom standard.

(4) Applying the Local Housing Allowance size criteria.

(5) Awarding priority according to whether the overcrowding is sufficiently severe to present a category 1 hazard under the Housing Health and Safety Rating System contained in the Housing Act 2004, Pt 1.

(6) Devising a local definition.

1 Children under the age of ten are not taken into account: HA 1985, s 325(2)(a).

2 This is defined as a room of a type normally used in the locality as a bedroom or living room: HA 1985, s 325(2)(b).

3 HA 1985, s 325(1).
Determined priority for allocation 4.88

4 Children under the age of one are not taken into account and children aged between one and ten are counted as a half-unit: HA 1985, s 326 (2)(a).
5 HA 1985, s 326(1) and (3). A room is available for sleeping accommodation if it is a room of a type normally used in the locality as a bedroom or living room: HA 1985, s 326(2)(b).
6 English Code, para 4.8.
7 English Code, para 4.8.
8 Local housing allowance rates are used to determine how much housing benefit is payable where a tenant rents from a private landlord. The rate of local housing allowance will depend on where the tenant lives and how many bedrooms he or she is entitled to: Housing Benefit Regulations 2006, SI 2006/213.

4.85 It is clear that there is something of a lottery in England as to whether any particular degree of overcrowding would fall within or outside this reasonable preference category for the purposes of any particular local allocation scheme. One survey asked respondents to specify the numbers of households on their list who were ‘in the reasonable preference category of overcrowding’. They found that:

‘On average, these accounted for 18 per cent of all new applicants on authorities’ housing registers. However, the proportions cited were wide-ranging – from over half in two authorities to less than one per cent in four others. While the incidence of overcrowding is certain to vary from area to area these findings suggest that local definitions of the phenomenon as incorporated within allocations policies may well vary more’.

4.86 The approach taken in the housing benefit scheme towards the number of bedrooms in a property is unlikely to be of assistance.

4.87 As to the scope of ‘unsatisfactory’ housing conditions, the Codes of Guidance each provide a list of suggested criteria, said to be for illustrative purposes only, although many local housing authorities will adopt most, or all, of the criteria in their own schemes as examples of what conditions are accepted by that particular local housing authority as amounting to unsatisfactory housing conditions. The Codes emphasise that the lists are not comprehensive or exhaustive (the English Code also describes its list as simply providing ‘possible indicators’) and that there may, in particular, be local factors that an individual local housing authority would wish to acknowledge in its allocation scheme.

2 English Code, para 4.12.

4.88 ‘Under-occupation’ is included in the illustrative list contained in the Welsh Code but has been omitted from the list in the latest English Code. That omission is probably the result of a desire to encourage local housing authorities in England to treat transfer applicants who are under-occupying as not falling within this reasonable preference category as defined in their local allocation schemes. In that way, the provisions of HA 1996, Pt 6, will not apply to their transfer applications which can be dealt with outside the normal

4.89 Whether to include under-occupation as a criterion in assessing ‘unsatisfactory housing’ remains a matter for each local housing authority, provided it has had regard to the relevant national guidance. All those local housing authorities in England which responded to a consultation exercise conducted in early 2012 reported that they ‘give priority in their allocation scheme to social tenants who are under-occupying their property, or are reviewing their allocation scheme in order to do so’

In one case in which a local allocation scheme gave considerable preference to under-occupying applicants, none of the parties ‘suggested that the very favourable treatment given to under-occupation transfers is unlawful’

1 Allocation of accommodation: guidance for local housing authorities in England: Summary of Responses to consultation (DCLG, June 2012), para 3.2.

4.90 Local housing authorities are often keen to transfer their own tenants who want a smaller property, so as to free up the larger property for an allocation. Since April 2013 the reduction in housing benefit, for working age tenants of social housing who are under-occupying, has provided a further incentive for registered providers to agree to transfers to smaller homes. Of course, where such a transfer is at the landlord’s initiative, there is no ‘allocation’ at all and the allocation scheme does not apply. In England, where a social housing tenant’s own application to a local housing authority for a transfer to a smaller property is prompted by the impact of the ‘bedroom tax’ (or ‘removal of the spare room subsidy’), the local housing authority will need to treat that as an application under HA 1996, Pt 6, only if its own allocation scheme has placed ‘under-occupation’ in its ‘unsatisfactory housing conditions’ category. Otherwise, the application can be dealt with outside of HA 1996, Pt 6 as a non-priority transfer, unless the applicant falls into one of the other ‘reasonable preference’ categories.

1 HA 1996, s 159(4B) (England) and s 159(5) (Wales). See 1.27(8). This may explain why under-occupation has hitherto not attracted such high priority within allocation schemes as might otherwise have been expected: see Exploring local authority policy and practice on housing allocations (DCLG, July 2009), para 16.
3 See 2.60.

4.91 Neither the statutory minimum definitions, nor the illustrative lists contained in the Codes, should inhibit advisers from assisting applicants to press for a local housing authority to treat them as within this third ‘reasonable preference’ category where circumstances suggest that the present home is ‘overcrowded’, ‘insanitary’ or otherwise ‘unsatisfactory’. Advisers will need to consider the wording used to reflect this broad statutory category in the particular local allocation scheme and then do their best to bring their clients within that wording.
Determining priority for allocation 4.97

People who need to move on medical or welfare grounds (including, in England, grounds relating to a disability)

4.92 This fourth ‘reasonable preference’ category should be reflected in every local housing allocation scheme so as to include any applicant for accommodation whose health or welfare, or that of a member of his or her household, is impaired by remaining in the accommodation currently occupied, and thus there is a ‘need to move’ elsewhere. For obvious reasons, no ‘reasonable preference’ must be accorded simply because an applicant wishes to move on welfare or medical grounds, for example to a warmer part of the country or to be nearer friends or relatives. The category is designed for those who ‘need’ to move.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(3)(d) (England), s 167(2)(d) (Wales).

4.93 Again, none of the terms ‘medical grounds’, ‘welfare grounds’ or ‘grounds relating to a disability’ are defined by HA 1996, Pt 6. Nor are there any direct links made to the definitions of these terms in any other statutes. In the first instance it is for local housing authorities to decide what the categories mean and to apply them when framing an allocation scheme.

4.94 The terms do not relate exclusively to the impact, on health or welfare, of the present accommodation alone, although any detrimental effect caused by the present accommodation would obviously fall within this test. As one judge put it:

‘the relevant question is whether the current housing conditions are having an adverse effect on the medical condition of the claimant, which itself creates a particular need for her to move’.

1 R (Ghandali) v Ealing London Borough Council [2006] EWHC 1859 (Admin), at [34], (2006) September Legal Action, p 14, Admin Ct per Leveson J.

4.95 The detrimental effect on health or welfare could be caused by the location of the present accommodation as much as by the physical conditions of that accommodation.

4.96 Thus, ‘medical grounds’ could relate to an adverse impact of the current accommodation on health (such as dampness having an effect on health, or the presence of inaccessible washing and toilet facilities) or there may be sound medical grounds for changing location, eg to relocate closer to a particular medical facility or to a carer, or to escape adverse environmental factors in the present location.

1 Welsh Code, para 3.128.

4.97 ‘Welfare grounds’ would seem to refer to care and support needs or other social needs that do not require medical care or support. Examples given in the Codes are the needs of those leaving care or other vulnerable persons who need a stable base from which to build a secure life, and the needs of vulnerable people who are not able to find their own accommodation. The English Code advises that this category would also include any need to move of those providing (or intending to provide) care and support to certain children:
4.98 Allocation Schemes

‘[t]his would include foster carers, those approved to adopt, or those being assessed for approval to foster or adopt, who need to move to a larger home in order to accommodate a looked after child or a child who was previously looked after by a local authority. It would also include special guardians, holders of a residence order and family and friends carers who are not foster carers but who have taken on the care of a child because the parents are unable to provide care,’

1 English Code, para 4.10; Welsh Code, para 3.32.
2 English Code, para 4.10.

4.98 Specialist advice is obviously helpful when assessing whether the applicant’s health or welfare necessitates a move. The Welsh Code recommends that the health or social care professional with direct knowledge of the applicant’s condition is contacted by the local housing authority for an opinion on the applicant’s health and its impact on the applicant’s housing needs. Such a person will usually be the applicant’s GP, consultant or social worker.

1 Welsh Code, para 3.31.

4.99 The local housing authority must, however, be careful in its treatment of the medical advice it receives. It must not delegate to a medical adviser its decision about whether an applicant meets those terms of its local allocation scheme which give effect to this reasonable preference category. The adviser advises, the local housing authority makes the decisions. A local housing authority should not confine itself to reliance on an assessment by its own medical adviser. It should seek information from the applicant’s own doctors or other relevant professionals. When the report from an external or in-house medical adviser is obtained, the local housing authority should not rely on any expressions of opinion or value judgments that it contains and which are beyond the remit of truly medical advice.

4.100 After a local housing authority’s medical adviser has advised on the evidence available at the time, and the local housing authority has made a decision as to the applicant’s entitlement to reasonable preference and priority under its scheme, if there is then further medical evidence or social work opinion, and/or subsequent events, the medical adviser is under a duty to consider that new information once brought to his or her attention. In a case where the medical adviser’s advice was not based on a proper consideration of new evidence and events, the local housing authority’s decision not to award the applicant any reasonable preference under this category was quashed and was required to be reconsidered.

4.101 The additional words ‘(including any grounds relating to a disability)’ were first introduced into HA 1996, Pt 6, in England on 27 April 2005 so as to make it clear that those applicants whose need to move relates to a disability (but who are not ill or otherwise in ‘medical’ need) would fall within this

‘reasonable preference’ category. However, they have never formed part of the applicable provisions in Wales and were not introduced there by the amendments made by the Localism Act 2011 or the H(W)A 2014.1

1 The then HA 1996, s 167(2)(d). As amended by Housing Act 2004, s 223.

4.102 The wording ‘(including any grounds relating to a disability)’ embraces those with a learning disability as well as those with a physical disability. Prior to the statutory amendment in England, the view that medical needs should be taken to include those needs relating to a disability was recommended by the then statutory guidance in any event. The Welsh Code provides extensive guidance on issues relating to disability in the context of social housing allocation even though the statutory amendment has not been brought into force in Wales.2

1 English Code, para 4.9.
2 Welsh Code, paras 3.33–3.34.

4.103 It is plain from the additional wording that the ‘disability’ referred to is not restricted to a disability of the applicant; it could be the disability of any member of the applicant’s household. Alternatively, the wording would be satisfied where a non-disabled applicant needs to move so as to be nearer to a disabled relative or some other disabled person. An argument that a local housing authority’s allocation scheme was unlawful because it did not allocate points to reflect ‘disability’ failed when the points awarded for health needs were shown to have included needs arising from disabilities.1

1 R v Lewisham London Borough Council ex p Pinzon (1999) 2 CCLR 152, QBD.

4.104 Local housing authorities may wish to consider whether an applicant’s needs could be met by providing aids and adaptations to the current accommodation, enabling him or her to remain in his or her present home.

4.105 The Codes provide illustrative lists of different types of ‘medical grounds’ and ‘welfare grounds’.1 Those illustrations encompass the types of accommodation that may be needed (adapted, improved, sheltered or ground floor), the type of medical condition that might fall within this criterion (mental illness or disorder, physical or learning disability, chronic or progressive medical conditions), and other types of vulnerability (such as young people at risk, people with behavioural difficulties or those recovering from the effects of violence). The needs of those who provide care, as well as those who receive it, are included in the illustrative lists. The need to be near friends, relatives or medical facilities for medical reasons is also mentioned. The Welsh Code, but not the English Code, includes recovery from alcohol or drug problems as a type of ‘medical ground’ that could fall within this category.2
The English Code uses the less specific terminology of ‘ability to fend for self restricted for other reasons’.3

4.106 Allocation Schemes

4.106 The Welsh Code recommends that once accommodation is allocated to a person falling within this category, his or her support and care needs should be assessed and there should be liaison with social services, Supporting People, Local Health Boards and other relevant agencies.

1 Welsh Code, para 3.33.

4.107 In October 2017, the UK Government stated its belief that there was 'good cause' for including within this category ‘those who are recovering from the effects of domestic abuse, and who need to move on from a refuge in order to build a stable life’1. It consulted on proposals to issue guidance to ‘make clear the circumstances in which’ local housing authorities would be expected to apply this category to victims of domestic violence living in refuges. Any such guidance would apply to local housing authorities in England only.

1 Improving Access to Social Housing for Victims of Domestic Abuse: Consultation (DCLG, October 2017).

People who need to move to a particular locality in the local housing authority's district where hardship would be caused if they did not move

4.108 This is the most recently created 'reasonable preference' category1 and was first introduced in January 20032. The Codes suggest that people may fall within it if they need to move in order to give or receive care, to be able to access specialised medical treatment, or to take up particular education, employment or training opportunities in some particular locality3. Some, but not all, of those examples would fall within 'medical or welfare grounds' in the fourth category, but those applicants who overlap are now entitled to be placed in both categories. Again, the emphasis is on 'need' to move, not a desire to move. This fifth category will also be suitable for victims of harassment or violence needing to move to safer areas.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(3)(e) (England), s 167(2)(e) (Wales).
3 English Code, para 4.11; Welsh Code, para 3.35.

4.109 A particular locality to which the applicant needs to move should be identified and, in order to get the benefit of this reasonable preference category, that locality must be within the district of the local housing authority to which application is made. Any need to move outside the district of the local housing authority in which the applicant presently resides requires either application to the other local housing authority in whose district the specific locality falls, or the use of any reciprocal agreements or nomination rights agreed between the two local housing authorities involved1.

1 In its report into a Complaint against London Borough of Ealing and London Borough of Brent, 14 019 234 and 15 016 582, 8 August 2016, (2016) November Legal Action p 41 the LGO criticised a reciprocal rehousing agreement intended for rehousing victims fleeing domestic violence which 'did not work effectively' (p 1) and failed to make clear that the receiving borough could reject a referral if it did not consider the applicant to be in priority need (p 12).
4.110 The need to move must be sufficiently great that 'hardship' would otherwise be caused, either to the applicant or to others. Neither HA 1996, Pt 6, nor the Codes define 'hardship', or the degree of severity required for an applicant to fall within this category. The hardship that might be caused to the applicant if he or she is not moved may well be fairly self-evident: deterioration in health, inability to take up education, employment or training opportunities, etc. The hardship that might be caused to others includes situations where an applicant needs to move to a particular locality to provide care to a friend or relative already living in that locality. The category is not limited to personal hardship. It may include financial hardship, for example, so as to accord preference to an applicant of limited means who needs to move from a high rent to a low rent district. This will become increasingly relevant as changes to welfare benefits limit the maximum benefits certain claimants can receive – whether as a cap on housing costs or as an overall cap on benefit receipts. The category could therefore include people subject to housing benefit restrictions (such as the 'bedroom tax') or other constraints on their incomes from benefits (such as benefit sanctions).

4.111 In 2015, new statutory guidance was issued to encourage more local housing authorities in England to treat applicants seeking to move for work purposes as falling within this ‘reasonable preference’ category. The new guidance states that:

‘This guidance goes further [than previous guidance] and strongly encourages all local authorities to apply the hardship reasonable preference category to tenants who are seeking to transfer and who need to move within the local authority district or from another local authority district to be closer to work, or to take up an offer of work’.

1 Right to Move: Statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local housing authorities in England (DCLG, March 2015). In addition to this guidance, the UK Government also made regulations stipulating that a person who needed to move to the district of a local housing authority for work-related reasons could not be disqualified from that local housing authority’s allocation scheme on local connection grounds: Allocation of Housing (Qualification Criteria for Right to Move) (England) Regulations 2015, SI 2015/967.

2 Right to Move: Statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local housing authorities in England (DCLG, March 2015) at [38]. For the Welsh response to this development, see Welsh Code para 3.36.

4.112 Having reviewed the importance of the allocation scheme making provision for classes of applicants falling within the statutory categories to be afforded ‘reasonable preference’, this chapter will next consider how a local housing allocation scheme can:

1. award additional preference; and/or
2. reduce preference.

Additional preference

4.113 HA 1996, Pt 6 gives a local housing authority the discretion to frame its allocation scheme so as to give ‘additional preference’ to particular descriptions of people who are already within the reasonable preference categories. The scheme does not need to contain a provision for this form of enhanced priority but may do so. HA 1996 does not define the scope of
4.113 Allocation Schemes

‘additional preference’ or offer illustrations of its application.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(3) (England) and s 167(2) (Wales), last sentence in each case.

4.114 Local housing authorities are advised by the Codes that they should consider whether they have a local need to exercise this discretion and include such provisions in their schemes, taking into account their local circumstances, and presumably the particular circumstances of likely applicants1. It should be noted that the provision does not enable the allocation scheme to be framed so as to simply afford additional preference to particular individuals. Under this statutory provision the scheme can be framed so as to give additional preference to ‘particular descriptions of people’ with urgent housing needs who are already within the reasonable preference classes.

1 English Code, para 4.13; Welsh Code, para 3.38.

4.115 Examples of descriptions of people who may be identified by a local housing authority in its allocation scheme as entitled to additional preference, by having more urgent housing needs than other reasonable preference applicants, are included in both Codes of Guidance.

4.116 The English Code suggests local housing authorities ‘should consider’ giving additional preference to three specific groups1:

- those who need to move urgently because of a life-threatening illness or sudden disability;
- families in severe overcrowding which poses a serious health hazard; and
- those who are homeless and require urgent re-housing as a result of violence or threats of violence, including intimidated witnesses, and those escaping serious anti-social behaviour or domestic violence.

1 English Code, para 4.13.

4.117 The Welsh Code gives the following examples of applicants to whom the local housing authority ‘should’ consider awarding additional preference1:

- those owed a homelessness duty as a result of being forced to leave their homes by actual or threatened violence (including intimidated witnesses);
- those who need to move for urgent medical reasons;
- those who have reasonable prospects of an offer of accommodation within a relatively short period but who suddenly lose their existing homes as a result of a disaster;
- those who are under-occupying and wish to move to smaller premises; and
- certain applicants with connections to the armed forces (see 4.119–4.123).

1 Welsh Code, para 3.38.

4.118 Both Codes are clear, however, that these are only examples1. The intention is that the local scheme should spell out the sorts of circumstances in which additional preference, and thus priority, will be given in respect of the most urgent housing needs. Thus, the House of Lords has upheld as lawful a scheme which gave additional priority (beyond ordinary reasonable preference) to only a small proportion of applicants and only on satisfaction of ‘stringent’ and ‘very strict’ criteria.
Determining priority for allocation 4.121

Armed forces

4.119 The UK Government has been particularly keen that local housing authorities should frame their schemes to give additional preference to applicants within the reasonable preference categories who have some connection with the armed forces. A circular issued in April 2009 recommended that any scheme which made provision for additional preference should give additional preference to:

‘any applicant who needs to move to suitable adapted accommodation because of a serious injury, medical condition or disability which he or she, or a member of their household, has sustained as a result of service in the Armed Forces.’

4.120 The 2010–15 UK Coalition Government took this a stage further and in 2012 exercised its regulation-making powers to amend HA 1996, s 166A(3). The amendments made by the HA 1996 (Additional Preference for Armed Forces) England Regulations 2012 require local housing authorities to frame their allocation schemes to give additional preference to the following categories of people connected with the military, who fall within at least one of the reasonable preference categories and who have urgent housing needs:

(1) former members of the armed forces;
(2) serving members of the armed forces who need to move because of a serious injury, medical condition or disability sustained as a result of their service;
(3) bereaved spouses and civil partners of members of the armed forces leaving services family accommodation following the death of their spouse or partner; and
(4) serving or former members of the reserve forces who need to move because of a serious injury, medical condition or disability sustained as a result of their service.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(7) (England).

2 SI 2012/2989 at Appendix 1 of this book. The purpose and extent of the regulations was explained to the House of Lords Grand Committee by Baroness Hanham on 20 November 2012 (Lords Debates, col GC 153) and is set out in the Explanatory Memorandum published with the regulations.

4.121 For these purposes ‘armed forces’ means the regular forces ie the Royal Navy, the Royal Marines, the regular army or the Royal Air Force.

1 Armed Forces Act 2006, s 374.

4.122 If they wish, local housing authorities in England may structure their allocation schemes to give more general priority to those with military connections than the regulations require - but they will do so under different powers.

1 See 4.141.

4.123 Although there has been no equivalent amending legislation in Wales, the Welsh Code invites local housing authorities to give additional preference to two categories of armed forces applicant:

- any applicant who needs to move to suitable adapted accommodation because of a serious injury, medical condition or disability which he or she, or a member of their household, has sustained as a result of service in the armed forces;
- people needing accommodation as a result of leaving the armed forces and the loss of military accommodation; and encourages local housing authorities to give ‘high priority’ to injured or disabled servicemen.

1 Welsh Code, para 3.38.

Adding, or reducing, preference for other reasons

4.124 Whilst it may seem unnecessary, given the existing power to grant additional preference which is discussed in the previous section, HA 1996, Pt 6, expressly provides a further power to enable local housing authorities to frame an allocation scheme so as to prioritise between applicants who are already within one or more of the ‘reasonable preference’ categories. Local housing authorities are therefore able to design schemes so as to give additional or reduced priority to people in the reasonable preference categories for any reasons that they choose to set out in those allocation schemes.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(5) (England) and s 167(2A) (Wales).

4.125 Enhancing priority for those in the reasonable preference categories by reference to the length of time an applicant has been waiting is an increasingly popular method adopted in allocation schemes. The use of waiting time is probably the simplest way of determining priorities between those with a similar level of need and its use as a criterion may have benefits of simplicity and transparency.

1 See the encouragement to take this approach given, for example, in the Welsh Code, para 3.45.

4.126 HA 1996, Pt 6, directs local housing authorities towards three particular factors that they might wish to take into account in framing their schemes so as to enable prioritisation between those in the reasonable preference categories. The three are:
Determining priority for allocation 4.128

(1) the financial resources available to the person; and/or
(2) any behaviour of the person or a member of his or her household which affects his or her suitability to be a tenant; and/or
(3) any local connection1 which exists between the person and the local housing authority’s district2.

1 Within the meaning of HA 1996, s 199 as amended by HRA 2017, s 8, for applications made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, or H(W)A 2014, s 81. For more on ‘local connection’ see CHAPTER 14.

2 HA 1996, s 166A(5) (England) and s 167(2A) (Wales).

Financial resources

4.127 The ‘financial resources’ category permits a local housing authority to give a higher priority in the allocation scheme to applicants who cannot afford to pay a market rent or to take out a mortgage, and, as the other side of that coin, a lower priority to applicants who are in a better financial position. An online survey of local housing authority practice in two English regions found that household resources (including, in some cases, capital in the form of equity and/or savings) were taken into account under the allocation policies of most local housing authorities responding to the survey. Troublingly, it also found that in rare cases local housing authorities were using resources as a complete bar to allocation at a time when exclusion for such a reason was unlawful1. The English Code suggests2 that the reference to ‘financial resources’ includes property ownership and that, in consequence, a scheme may be framed so as to give reduced priority to an applicant who falls within a ‘reasonable preference’ category if he or she is a home-owner (assuming that the local housing authority has declined to follow that Code’s earlier guidance3 and make home owners a non-qualifying category). That Code also suggests that, if it adopts ‘financial resources’ as a criterion for reducing preference, a local housing authority could make provision for disregarding any lump sum received by a member of the armed forces as compensation for an injury or disability sustained on active service4. The Welsh Code simply suggests that the power could be used to give less preference to an applicant who is financially able to buy or rent privately5.

Behaviour

4.128 The ‘behaviour’ category permits local housing authorities to include provision in an allocation scheme to reward good behaviour and penalise bad behaviour among those who fall into the reasonable preference categories. During the debate in the House of Lords on this provision, the then Housing Minister, Lord Falconer, contrasted the examples of two applicants: one who had:
4.128 Allocation Schemes

... a history of persistent but minor rent arrears not caused by any problems with housing benefit and another ... who has demonstrated that he is a model tenant'.

1 Hansard, HL Deb, vol 630, ser 6, col 1017 (15 January 2002), (Lord Falconer).

4.129 The latter could be accorded priority over the former. The ‘model tenant’ example of relevant ‘behaviour’ has been carried into the statutory guidance for England with the additional example of an applicant who has ‘benefited the community’.

1 English Code, para 4.17.

4.130 In R (Osei) v Newham London Borough Council the local allocation scheme enabled the housing authority to take into account former tenant arrears as an aspect of ‘behaviour’ when prioritising between applicants who would otherwise qualify for urgent rehousing on domestic violence or other emergency grounds. The court held that such a provision would not be unlawful provided it was applied with a flexibility which allowed for the personal circumstances of an applicant which might justify not taking into account that past behaviour in a particular case. In R (Joseph) v Newham London Borough Council the allocation scheme enabled account to be taken of ‘property-related debts’ and gave the example of housing benefit overpayments. The court held that this did not permit the local housing authority to reduce preference where an overpayment had been outstanding so long that it could not be recovered by any legal process. The operation of this ‘property-related debt’ provision in Newham’s allocation scheme has spawned not only these two judicial reviews but also a successful complaint to the LGO.

4.131 A local housing authority will not be able to take into account behaviour relating to a spent conviction. Under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974, s 41(1) where a rehabilitated person’s conviction is spent, he or she is to be treated ‘for all purposes in law as a person who has not committed or been charged with or prosecuted for or convicted of or sentenced for’ the offence or offences which were the subject of the conviction. In considering whether to change a person’s priority under a housing allocation scheme because of his or her behaviour, the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974, s 4(1) prohibits the local housing authority from taking into account behaviour relating to a conviction which is spent. If, however, it is possible to identify reprehensible behaviour which does not form part of conduct constituting spent offences, this may be taken into consideration.

1 By analogy with the decision in R (YA) v Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council [2016] EWHC 1850 (Admin), [2016] HLR 39, Admin Ct, which held that behaviour relating to a spent conviction could not be taken into account when deciding whether an applicant fell within a non-disqualifying class.

Determining priority for allocation 4.134

4.132 Two examples of ‘good’ behaviour given in the English Code, as potentially justifying provision for additional preference in an allocation scheme, are where:

(1) the applicant is in a household where at least one member is in work or seeking work; or

(2) the applicant’s actions have otherwise directly benefited the community.

It seems that several local housing authorities have adopted either or both of these classes of additional preference in their allocation schemes. Research conducted by the Chartered Institute of Housing in late 2013 found ‘a number of landlords incentivising applicants that are in work or contributing to their community through volunteering. Some are awarding priority in their allocation scheme while others are advertising properties with a preference for those that are working or are making a community contribution’.

1 English Code, para 4.27.
2 English Code, para 4.17.
3 ‘New approaches to allocations’ (CIH, June 2014), p 10.

4.133 An allocation scheme which gives additional priority to working tenants may be indirectly discriminatory against disabled people and women with childcare responsibilities, as they are less likely to be able to work. However, a recent challenge brought on this basis was unsuccessful. It was not disputed that the measure had a legitimate aim, namely . . . the creation of sustainable and balanced communities and encouraging residents to make a contribution to the local community, nor that the policy had a ‘rational connection to that objective’. The ‘real question’ was whether the scheme ‘was the least intrusive measure which could be used without unacceptably compromising the objective’. The judge decided that it was: the local housing authority had made provision for ‘those with priority need, for the homeless and vulnerable, for those who need to move on medical or welfare or hardship grounds’. It was entitled to favour workers and volunteers. Extending the class would reduce the benefit of being within it. The scheme contained an overriding discretion for exceptional cases.

At the time of writing there was an outstanding application for permission to appeal against this decision. For an example of an allocation scheme which sought to reward ‘working households’ and ‘model tenants’ by setting aside a proportion of lettings for such applicants, rather than awarding them additional priority, see R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council [2017] EWCA Civ 1127, [2018] HLR 2, CA.

4.134 The Welsh Code deals with the ‘behaviour’ category only in relation to the possibility of reducing priority for previous poor behaviour but reminds local housing authorities in Wales that policies regarding the application of sanctions on the grounds of unacceptable behaviour should accommodate the Welsh Government’s broader policy aims of promoting equality of opportunity, social inclusion and sustainability.\(^1\)

\(^1\) Welsh Code, para 3.41(b).

\(^2\) Welsh Code, para 2.44.

4.135 Some local housing authorities also choose to penalise applicants who fail to bid, or who refuse offers of accommodation, by reducing their priority within the scheme. Any such sanction should be clearly set out within the scheme. In addition, it should be made clear to the individual applicant what is expected of them. One recent complaint to the Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman (LGSCO) concerned a couple whose priority had been reduced from Band 1 to Band 4 because, the local housing authority said, they had ‘not actively expressed interest in suitable advertised homes’. The LGSCO found that the local housing authority was at fault because it had not explained to the couple what was expected of them: ‘While it gave general advice on the need to bid, it did not provide advice on what the Council thought reasonable’.\(^1\)

Local connection

4.136 The ‘local connection’ category enables discrimination in a housing allocation scheme, among those within the reasonable preference categories, in favour of local applicants. ‘Local connection’ is defined in both HA 1996, s 199 and H(W)A 2014, s 81 as existing where a person has a connection with an area: because he or she is or was normally resident there of his or her own choice; because he or she is employed in the area; due to family associations; or in special circumstances. A person is also deemed to have a local connection with an area if he or she was at any time provided with accommodation there under the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, s 95 and, in England, if he or she is or was owed certain duties under the Children Act 1989. A local housing authority is entitled, should it so choose, to make provision in its scheme so as to give a higher priority to an applicant who has a local connection with its district (either personally or because a member of his or her household has a local connection). On the face of it, this seems perfectly rational in the distribution of limited resources. In dealing with a challenge to the allocation scheme that Hackney London Borough Council operated for the distribution of pitches on its official Gypsy and Traveller sites, which included a local connection requirement, a judge said:

‘For my part, I discern no irrationality in the starting point of Hackney’s policy that requires a residential connection with the borough, nor in the requirement that residence must be contemporary, in the sense that the traveller can show either continuing physical presence, or that the traveller has retained a c/o address in the borough. It must make sense to afford priority to those who are in fact living in Hackney, or who have lived there and have retained a firm point of contact with Hackney.’\(^1\)

4 R (McDonagh) v Hackney London Borough Council [2012] EWHC 373 (Admin), (2012) April Legal Action, p 46, Admin Ct per Kenneth Parker J at [27]. However, in R (VC) v North Somerset Council (EHRC intervening) (2016) October Legal Action, p 33, a challenge to a ‘local connection’ requirement within the local housing authority’s housing allocations scheme which had been extended to cover Gypsy/Traveller site allocations was compromised by way of a consent order under which the local housing authority agreed to place the claimant on its housing register and review its scheme.

4.137 Local housing authorities in Wales are advised in the Welsh Code that they should be careful, when using this provision, to comply with the Equality Act 2010 and not to detract from the overall requirement that the allocation scheme must give an overall preference to those in the reasonable preference categories’. Some local housing authorities have operated ‘sons and daughters’ policies whereby children of local residents are given priority over applicants who have moved into the area more recently. This provision for enhanced priority by reference to local connection permits local housing authorities to operate such policies, provided that they ensure that the local allocation scheme adopted is not contrary to the Equality Act 2010 and, more generally, does not run counter to other equal opportunities considerations.\(^1\)

4.138 Where the allocation scheme gives additional weighting based on local connection, it is likely to result in greater complexity, particularly if the scheme generally uses a banding system to confer priority. It is well recognised that a scheme which attaches particular priority to local connection could disadvantage some applicants. Nevertheless, allocation schemes frequently reflect local political priorities by providing for enhanced priority for local connection cases which are also within the reasonable preference categories. In R (van Boolen) v Barking & Dagenham London Borough Council\(^1\) the local housing authority’s policy was to take account of local connection when there was more than one bidder, in the same high priority band, shortlisted for a property under its choice-based letting scheme. The bidder in that band with a local connection would normally be preferred to a bidder without such a connection. Although the practice had resulted in the claimant being repeatedly shortlisted, but never successful, her claim that the policy was unlawful was rejected.

\(^1\) R (van Boolen) v Barking & Dagenham London Borough Council [2009] EWHC 2196 (Admin), September Legal Action, p 34, Admin Ct.

4.139 The Codes of Guidance particularly highlight recent changes to the statutory definition of ‘local connection’ which have improved the standing of serving military personnel’.\(^1\)

\(^1\) English Code, para 4.18; Welsh Code, para 3.41(c).

4.140 More recently, supplementary statutory guidance issued to local housing authorities in England has suggested that the statutory power to give additional preference in an allocation scheme to those with a local connection might usefully be exercised in two particular ways:
4.140 Allocation Schemes

(1) to give priority to those with a local connection to a particular parish, within a local housing authority’s district, where lettings in rural villages need to be dealt with sensitively as part of a local lettings scheme; or

(2) to give priority to those with a local connection to a particular local housing authority’s district where a group of local housing authorities collectively apply a broader residency test for qualification for admission to a common allocation scheme.¹

Other examples of reasons to enhance, or reduce, preference

4.141 HA 1996, Pt 6 contains no limit on the features that a local housing authority could include in an allocation scheme so to determine priorities between those entitled to a reasonable preference. Local housing authorities are reminded by the Codes of Guidance that the three particular factors that the legislation suggests might be included in an allocation scheme (discussed at 4.127–4.140 above), so as to enhance or reduce relative priorities among those entitled to a reasonable preference, are not mandatory or exhaustive.² Within local housing allocation schemes, local housing authorities may give priority to, or downgrade, yet further classes of applicant who are otherwise within the ‘reasonable preference’ categories. However, they are also reminded by the Codes that each application has to be considered on its own merits.³

¹ HA 1996, s 166A(5) (England) and s 167(2A) (Wales) each provide that a housing allocation scheme ‘may’ contain provisions for determining such priorities and that the factors taken into account in any such provisions, ‘may’ include the three specified ones.

² English Code, para 4.13; Welsh Code, para 3.41.

³ For example, Welsh Code, para 3.39. See too the guidance relating to those with a history of rent arrears given at Welsh Code, paras 2.44(iii) and 3.50.

4.142 A local housing authority must not add or reduce priority in a way which is unlawfully discriminatory. In R (Fartun Osman) v Harrow London Borough Council⁴ the local housing authority’s scheme originally awarded Band A priority to all severely overcrowded households. This was amended with the effect that severely overcrowded households in the private rented sector had their priority reduced to Band C. Severely overcrowded households in the social housing sector remained in Band A. The rationale put forward by the local housing authority to justify the change was that severely overcrowded households in the private rented sector had been remaining in unsuitable accommodation in the hope of receiving an offer of an allocation of social housing, when they could in fact move to more suitable accommodation within the private rented sector. This was held not to be an option for households in the social housing sector, who could not be expected to give up their security of tenure. A challenge to the amended scheme on the grounds that it unlawfully discriminated against private rented sector tenants failed. Whilst it did discriminate against tenants in the private rented sector when compared to tenants in social housing, the measure was a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.

1. [2017] EWHC 274 (Admin), Admin Ct. At the time of writing there was an outstanding application for permission to appeal against this decision.

4.143 The scope of the statutory discretion to set priorities among those within the ‘reasonable preference’ categories is plainly wide but the bottom line is that (save in respect of the circumstances described at 4.147–4.158) the effect of any reduction in priority must not be to eliminate all preference, with the result that a person in a ‘reasonable preference’ category is in practice getting no preference at all. A scheme which ‘defers’ applications made by those within ‘reasonable preference’ categories may also be unlawful. In R (Alemi) v Westminster City Council[1], the scheme prohibited applicants who were entitled to a reasonable preference by virtue of being owed a homelessness duty from bidding under its choice-based letting scheme for one year. The judge quashed those parts of the amended scheme on the basis that:

‘Part VI of the Act does not permit the removal of a whole sub-group from a group which section 166A(3) requires be given reasonable preference in the allocation of social housing, when that sub-group is not defined by reference to differentiating features related to the allocation of housing, but applies a simple time bar to all who otherwise qualify’.

However, the judge did indicate that a provision which suspended the bidding rights of a particular ‘reasonable preference group’ which had been ‘securing a greater proportion’ of properties than planned in order to allow another reasonable preference group to ‘catch up’ might be lawful, if its purpose was ‘to distribute the limited stock of available housing on rational grounds of relative priority’. In addition, another court has been prepared to hold that provisions in an allocation scheme enabling the ‘deferral’ of applications made by those within ‘reasonable preference’ categories (eg for the refusal of a suitable offer) would not be unlawful[2].

4.144 Precisely ‘how’ reasonable preference is enhanced or reduced by the exercise of these powers is a matter for the particular local housing allocation scheme. For example, if an applicant in a reasonable preference category has rent arrears his or her priority might be reflected in a reduction in points (in a points-based scheme), a move to a lower band (in a banded scheme) or a date adjustment (in a date-order scheme).

SUSPENSION

4.145 For many years it has been unclear whether the statutory powers enable an applicant or application to be suspended from a scheme or from bidding under a scheme (for example until arrears were cleared or reduced). For the time being, that issue appears to have been resolved in favour of suspension being a lawful exercise of these powers by a case involving Westminster...
4.145 Allocation Schemes

City Council’s allocation scheme. Section 10 of that scheme suspended applicants from bidding if they owed more than a week’s rent, subject to the possibility of the Director of Housing permitting bidding by an applicant with arrears in exceptional cases. In a challenge to that provision, it was conceded by the claimant that suspension might be lawful but it was argued that it was not lawful where it was triggered by an absolute threshold applied in every case (subject to the exceptional override). That argument was rejected at trial1. However, in dismissing an application for permission to appeal from that decision, the appeal court judge put the matter much more broadly. He said:

‘... we are concerned with someone who has been given preference but who has been temporarily suspended from bidding under the choice-based scheme while they have rent arrears. That is lawful within [HA 1996, s 167] subsection (2A)(b) ...’

As I understand it, there is no quarrel with the proposition that the council may in principle have a scheme which suspends from bidding those who have arrears of rent. The only criticism of this scheme is that the suspension is automatic provided a certain rental arrears threshold is reached; and it is then open to the person who is suspended to seek to persuade the Director of Housing that they ought to be allowed to bid “in exceptional circumstances”. Again, it seems to me that it cannot possibly be said that the scheme is so irrational as to be unlawful. It is clearly sensible to have a fixed threshold so that not every arrears of rent, however minor, will trigger suspension, but so that everybody knows that if they go over a certain level then they will be suspended. The scheme contains the necessary safety valve to enable those who are in arrears to explain to the Director of Housing that there is some good reason for them being in arrears, for example because they are ill in hospital or whatever. In those circumstances the Director of Housing can then allow bidding to take place “in exceptional circumstances”, and that indeed is precisely what happened in the appellant’s case.

‘... It is plainly sensible to have a clear-cut arrears threshold over which one will not be allowed to bid unless one can persuade the director of housing that there are exceptional circumstances. It seems to me that there is nothing arguably unlawful about that policy.’

4.146 If the local housing authority does wish to be able to suspend applicants, a rule to that effect must be included in the scheme and be properly applied in each individual’s case1. In Complaint against Cymdeithas Tai Eryr2, the registered social landlord had a policy enabling it to suspend a housing application for ‘unacceptable behaviour’ of a type making the applicant unsuitable to be a tenant but it wrongly used that policy to suspend an applicant for providing misleading information in an application form. The Ombudsman said that if it wished to suspend for that reason, its published policies should be amended to make that clear.

Removing ‘reasonable preference’ altogether 4.149

REMOVING ‘REASONABLE PREFERENCE’ ALTOGETHER

4.147 An applicant who falls within one or more of the ‘reasonable preference’ categories may be deprived of that status, and given no preference at all, but only if either:

(1) the applicant is entitled to a reasonable preference under the first or second of the statutory reasonable preference categories and his or her entitlement to reasonable preference would not have arisen but for the presence in his or her household of a ‘restricted person’; or

(2) a local housing authority in Wales decides that he or she or a member of his or her household has been guilty of ‘unacceptable behaviour’.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(4) (England), s 167(2ZA) (Wales).
2 HA 1996, s 167(2B) and (2C).

The presence of a ‘restricted person’

4.148 The first ground for removal of a reasonable preference arises where:

(1) the reasonable preference is made out by satisfaction of the first or second categories for such a preference (homelessness or a specific duty owed to the homeless); and

(2) the application would not have fallen within those categories without the local housing authority having had regard to a ‘restricted person’ (within the meaning of HA 1996, Pt 7 (England) or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 (Wales)).

1 HA 1996, s 166A(4) (England), s 167(2ZA) (Wales).
2 HA 1996, s 166A(3)(a) and (b) (England), s 167(2)(a) and (b) (Wales). See 4.58–4.66 for the first category and 4.67–4.79 for the second category.
4 A ‘restricted person’ is a person who is not eligible for assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7 (as amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, Ch 2; who is subject to immigration control within the meaning of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996; and either who does not have leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom or whose leave to enter or remain is subject to a condition of no recourse to public funds: HA 1996, s 184(7) (England); Housing (Wales) Act 2014, s 63(5) (Wales).

4.149 A ‘restricted person’ is defined at HA 1996, s 184(7) (England) and H(W)A 2014, s 63(5) (Wales). Only if both the conditions in 4.148 are fulfilled is the applicant deprived of the reasonable preference to which he or she would otherwise have been entitled. This provision illustrates the policy intention that homeless households with ‘restricted persons’ should be looking to the private rented sector, rather than to social housing, for their long-term accommodation needs. An applicant entitled to a reasonable preference under any of the third to fifth statutory categories retains that preference even if it has been triggered by the needs of a restricted person.

4.150 Allocation Schemes

The ‘unacceptable behaviour’ test: local housing authorities in Wales

4.150 Until 18 June 2012, local housing authorities in both England and Wales could remove entirely, on ‘unacceptable behaviour’ grounds, the reasonable preference of a person otherwise entitled to it. However, since that date local housing authorities in England have had the power to adopt classes of persons who do not qualify at all for social housing allocation in their districts. This left the ‘removal of preference’ power unnecessary – those who would have lost preference on ‘unacceptable behaviour’ grounds can now be kept out of allocation arrangements altogether.

1 See Chapter 3.

4.151 That has left the power to remove preference altogether on ‘unacceptable behaviour’ grounds only available to local housing authorities in Wales.

4.152 A local housing authority in Wales may only treat an applicant otherwise entitled to a ‘reasonable preference’ as having no preference when it is satisfied that:

- the applicant, or a member of his or her household, has been guilty of unacceptable behaviour serious enough to make him or her unsuitable to be a tenant of the local housing authority; and
- at the time that the application is being considered and by reason of that behaviour, the applicant deserves not to be treated as a member of a group of people who are given ‘reasonable preference’.

1 HA 1996, s 167(2B) and (2C). See Welsh Code, paras 2.41–2.42 and 3.46.

4.153 The definition of ‘unacceptable behaviour’ is the same as that applied in determining eligibility for an allocation in Wales. That is to say, behavior, by the applicant or by a member of his or her household, which would, if the applicant were a secure tenant of the local housing authority, entitle it to a possession order on any ground in Housing Act 1985 (HA 1985), s 84A or in Sch 2, Pt 1 (other than Ground 8).

4.154 Before removing any ‘reasonable preference’ to which an applicant would otherwise be entitled, a local housing authority in Wales must therefore ask itself:

1. Would the applicant’s behaviour, or that of a member of his or her household, have come within one of the grounds for possession?
2. Would the court make an absolute order under HA 1985, s 84A or consider it reasonable to make an order for possession under HA 1985, Sch 2, Pt 1, Grounds 1–7?
3. Where the order would be made under HA 1985, s 84 (not HA 1985, s 84A, where there is no power to suspend or postpone), would the order be an outright, not a suspended or postponed, possession order?

1 The local housing authority should not take into account behaviour which relates to a spent conviction: R (YA) v Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council [2016] EWHC 1850 (Admin), [2016] HLR 39, Admin Ct.
Removing ‘reasonable preference’ altogether 4.158

4.155 Only after it has considered those three questions (where applicable) and answered them all in the affirmative, may the local housing authority then decide whether, at the time that the application is being considered, the applicant deserves not to be given the reasonable preference to which he or she would otherwise be entitled. The key issue that the local housing authority should consider is whether there has been a change of circumstances since those events that led to the affirmative answers to the three questions identified above.

1 For a fuller discussion of the correct approach to this part of the statutory test, see 3.192–3.194.

4.156 If a local housing authority in Wales decides that an applicant should have his or her ‘reasonable preference’ removed on the grounds of ‘unacceptable behaviour’, it must notify the applicant in writing of the decision and of the grounds for it. The applicant has the right to request a review of that decision and to be informed of the review decision and of the grounds for it. Any further challenge to the review decision would be by judicial review or by complaint, ultimately to the Public Services Ombudsman for Wales.

1 HA 1996, s 167(4A)(b) and (d). See also 2.86–2.102.

4.157 This provision, permitting the removal of preference, operates as an alternative to the power available to a local housing authority in Wales to treat an applicant as wholly ineligible for an allocation by reason of his or her unacceptable behaviour. It may therefore be used in respect of an applicant where the local housing authority in Wales has considered his or her behaviour for the purposes of eligibility and concluded that he or she is eligible but nevertheless considers that the behaviour should deprive him or her of the ‘reasonable preference’ that would otherwise be accorded.

1 Discussed at 3.151–3.200. One local housing authority’s policy that an applicant in rent arrears would be allowed onto its allocation scheme and entitled to points, but would not receive an offer whilst the arrears continued was found to be an attempt to apply this provision, rather than to hold the applicant ineligible: R (Onuegbu) v Hackney London Borough Council [2005] EWHC 1277 (Admin), (2005) August Legal Action, p 17, Admin Ct. That interpretation, however, does not sit easily with the statutory provision which does not allow for suspension but simply a removal of a reasonable preference to which the applicant would otherwise be entitled.

4.158 Even if an applicant in Wales, with a background of unreasonable behaviour, survives both the eligibility test and the removal of ‘reasonable preference’ test, he or she may still be accorded a lower preference than others in similar circumstances by being given a lower priority than he or she would otherwise receive.

4.159 Allocation Schemes

PRIORITY FOR OTHER CLASSES OF APPLICANT (WHO DO NOT FALL WITHIN ANY REASONABLE PREFERENCE CATEGORY)

4.159 Although HA 1996, Pt 6 requires an allocation scheme to be framed so as to give a reasonable preference to the five statutory classes of applicant described above, it does not prohibit a local housing authority from also framing its allocation scheme to give preferences or priorities to other groups or classes of applicant reflecting local circumstances. Local housing authorities in England and Wales are free to adopt other priority classes of their own choosing, provided that the overall requirement that the statutory classes receive a reasonable preference in the scheme is not displaced. Indeed, the Secretary of State has positively encouraged local housing authorities in England to ‘take advantage of this flexibility’ and many are actively doing so.

As the Codes put it, local housing authorities are free to prioritise groups of applicants who do not fall into the reasonable preference categories provided that:

1. they do not dominate the scheme, and
2. overall, the scheme operates to give reasonable preference to those who are in the statutory reasonable preference categories over those who are not.

1 Welsh Code, para 3.40.
2 English Code, para 4.19.
3 See the examples given in New approaches to allocations (Chartered Institute of Housing [CIH], June 2014), Under pressure? Emerging issues for allocations (CIH, November 2013), How to . . . consider new approaches to allocations and lettings (CIH, April 2012) and Allocations and Local Flexibility (CIH, March 2010).

4.160 If this advice is followed and unlawful discrimination is avoided, there is no limit as to the number of categories that may be given preference in a local allocation scheme nor any limit as to the size of the class of prospective or actual applicants each category may embrace.

4.161 By virtue of the fact that local housing authorities are required to have regard to statutory guidance, the Secretary of State (in England) or the Welsh Minister (in Wales) are able to identify and promote particular classes of applicant they would wish local housing authorities at least to consider prioritizing through the Codes. The guidance ranges in emphasis from mere suggestion that local housing authorities may like to consider giving one particular group priority to local housing authorities being ‘strongly encouraged’ or ‘urged’ to give preference to other suggested groups.

1 Contrast, for example, the language used within English Code, paras 4.22–4.32.

4.162 The English Code particularly singles out for possible priority treatment within local allocation schemes the following groups (to the extent that they do not already fall within the reasonable preference categories adopted in those schemes):

- current and former members of the armed forces and their family members;
- applicants who are in work or seeking work or living with others who are in work or seeking work;
Priority for other classes of applicant 4.164

- prospective adopters and foster carers; and
- former social housing tenants forced to move into the private sector by housing benefit penalties for under-occupation who later wish to move back to social housing.

2. English Code, para 4.27. Some of the difficulties in framing a priority class for this group are set out in Allocation of accommodation: guidance for local housing authorities in England Summary of responses to consultation (DCLG, June 2012), paras 3.66–3.77. For an example of a challenge to an allocation scheme which set aside 20% of lettings for ‘working households’ and ‘model tenants’ see R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council [2017] EWCA Civ 1127, [2018] HLR 2, CA.

3. English Code, para 4.30–4.32. Some of the issues around affording special priority for this group are set out in Allocation of accommodation: guidance for local housing authorities in England Summary of responses to consultation (DCLG, June 2012), paras 3.78–3.87. In R (Aslamie) v London & Quadrant Housing Trust [2016] EWHC (Admin) 2396, the court upheld a decision to refuse to consent to a mutual exchange on the grounds that the claimant would be under-occupying, despite his desire to adopt. The court agreed that the defendant was ‘not obliged to grant consent by reference to the future intentions of the claimant’ (at [5]).

4.163 The Welsh Code suggests that priority might be given under allocation schemes to:

- promote job-related and training-related mobility;
- help those who are under-occupying (given the changes in welfare benefits);
- meet the needs of extended families; and
- sustain rural or Welsh-speaking communities.

4.164 Local housing authorities in England and Wales are free to adopt, modify or reject the suggested classes for prioritisation put forward in the statutory guidance provided they can demonstrate that they have at least ‘had regard’ to the relevant code in making their choices when framing their schemes. Some local housing authorities may share the views of the Chartered Institute of Housing that ‘there is very little detail in the new guidance [for England] in ensuring the needs of all communities are taken into account’ or the views of those who responded to the consultation on the draft English Code and who, according to the DCLG’s Summary of Responses, ‘were concerned that the guidance lacked clarity or would have preferred more detailed guidance, and were concerned about the risk of legal challenge, or that this would lead to a wide variety of approaches and inconsistency between local authority areas. In particular, there was a call for more guidance on how to strike an appropriate balance between the reasonable preference requirements, local policy priorities and the Government’s policy priorities’.

1. HA 1996, s 169(1).
4.165 Allocation Schemes

PRIORITY FOR PARTICULAR TYPES OF ACCOMMODATION

4.165 An allocation scheme does not need to apply uniformly to the whole of a local housing authority’s available housing stock, or to all the available nominations to private registered providers or registered social landlords. HA 1996, Pt 6, provides that a scheme may, in effect, identify that specified accommodation is available to be allocated:

(1) only to those who make specific applications for it; or
(2) only to a particular group or groups of applicants (whether or not in one of the statutory reasonable preference categories).

1 HA 1996, s 166A(6) (England), s 167(2E) (Wales).

4.166 By these means, HA 1996, Pt 6, allows the local allocation scheme to be drawn so that, in respect of certain types of accommodation specified in the scheme, the normal ‘reasonable preference’ categories do not, in effect, apply. Care must be taken in framing these provisions in any local allocation scheme. These two special provisions are still subject to the over-arching requirement that the scheme must be framed so as to secure a reasonable preference for all five of the statutory reasonable preference categories. The position remains that the scheme must be drawn in terms ensuring that, overall, a reasonable preference is given to applicants who fall within the reasonable preference categories over those who do not.

1 English Code, paras 4.5 and 4.19; Welsh Code, paras 3.68 and 3.71.

4.167 The function of the first special provision – that the scheme may provide for the allocation of particular accommodation to those who specifically apply for it – is to facilitate ‘choice’. It enables the adoption of advertising schemes whereby applicants can apply for particular properties which have been advertised as vacant by the housing authority. It is thus the lynch-pin for the concept of choice-based lettings, although it is a rather roundabout way of achieving that objective.

1 See 5.6–5.47.

4.168 In local allocation schemes not structured on choice-based letting, the type of accommodation most likely to be specifically earmarked for those who make ‘a specific application’ for it is what is commonly known as ‘hard to let’ housing – in respect of which there is little point in operating the normal allocation scheme, because offers are likely to be refused. Indeed, where there is housing stock of that sort, local housing authorities in England are invited to consider adopting different, less stringent, qualification criteria than they operate for the rest of their stock.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(6)(a) (England), s 167(2E)(a) (Wales).
2 Welsh Code, para 3.75.

4.169 The form of accommodation most likely to be earmarked, under the second special provision, for a particular group or groups of applicants (in the statutory language, ‘persons of a particular description’) is the stock of purpose-built or adapted accommodation designed for use by the disabled or elderly. Inclusion of such a provision in an allocation scheme can ensure that such specialist housing is available to those who most need it. The current Codes of guidance give particular emphasis to the needs of injured or disabled armed services personnel whilst the Welsh Code specifically promotes the use of Accessible Housing Registers.
Local lettings schemes 4.172

1 HA 1996, s 166A(6)(b) (England), s 167(2E)(b) (Wales).
2 Welsh Code, paras 3.97–3.104 and see No place like home: five million reasons to make housing disability friendly (Leonard Cheshire Disability, December 2014).
3 Welsh Code, paras 3.120–3.122.

4.170 The use of the power to make special provision for particular classes of persons, who need not be within a reasonable preference category, can sometimes produce unusual results. For example, a local housing authority may have a surfeit of applicants for general accommodation who fall within one or more ‘reasonable preference’ categories, but its scheme may have excluded particular accommodation from the general pool and earmarked it for the elderly or disabled. If there is little demand for that earmarked accommodation, an elderly or disabled applicant could receive an offer almost immediately, even if his or her circumstances would otherwise command no reasonable, or other, preference at all under the local allocation scheme.

4.171 There is at least one other circumstance in which a local allocation scheme could usefully make provision in respect of allocation of particular properties only for particular applicants. That is to ensure that property is not allocated to an applicant in a particular locality in the local housing authority’s district in which he or she has previously been the victim (or, perhaps, perpetrator) of anti-social behaviour. In R (Carney) v Bolton-at-Home Ltd an allocation scheme, which utilised choice-based letting, contained a provision enabling a bypass to be applied to the applicant at the top of the shortlist for any property if the allocation would result in a person previously evicted for anti-social behaviour being rehoused in the same area as that where the behaviour took place, even if the applicant was otherwise eligible and qualified to be allocated any other accommodation. The provision was not unlawful and had been lawfully applied in the particular case.

Local lettings schemes: guidance

4.172 Statutory guidance suggests that the power to make special provision for particular classes of persons, who need not be within a reasonable preference category, in relation to particular housing accommodation provides ‘the statutory basis for so-called ‘local lettings policies’ which may be used to achieve a wide variety of housing management and policy objectives’. Specific attention is given in both Codes of Guidance to suggestions that local housing authorities identify particular types or clusters or locations of housing for particular types of applicants and deal with allocation of them by way of local Lettings policies.

1 See generally, Exploring local authority policy and practice on housing allocations (DCLG July 2009), chapter 5 – Local lettings policies.

3 See the Welsh Code, paras 3.68–3.74. The suggestions made in the English Code are not gathered in one discrete section.

4.173 For example, the English Codes suggest that local housing authorities in England might:

- set aside a proportion of properties for ‘former members of the armed forces’ under a local lettings policy;
- use a local lettings policy to ‘ensure that specific properties, or a specified proportion of properties, are allocated to households in particular types of employment where, for example, skills are in short supply’;
- set aside a ‘quota of properties each year for people who need to move to larger accommodation in order to foster or adopt a child on the recommendation of children’s services’;
- use a local lettings policy for allocation of accommodation in rural villages and give priority within that policy to applicants with a connection to a particular parish; or
- set a quota for the proportion of properties that it expects to allocate each year to transferring tenants who need to move into their district for work related reasons (the Right to Move quota). The Secretary of State strongly encourages all local authorities to adopt such an approach and considers that an appropriate quota would be at least 1%.

3 English Code, para 4.31.

5 Right to Move: Statutory guidance on social housing allocations for local housing authorities in England (DCLG, March 2015) at [42].

4.174 The Welsh Code suggests that local housing authorities in Wales can use local lettings policies to address a range of issues including:

- creating more mixed communities;
- dealing with a concentration of deprivation;
- ensuring properties that are particularly suited to being made accessible (eg ground floor flats) are prioritised for those with access needs;
- relocating essential workers such as teachers, nurses and police officers within a reasonable travelling distance from their work;
- supporting people in work/volunteering or who are seeking work or seeking to take up volunteering opportunities;
- dealing sensitively with lettings in rural areas to sustain communities by giving priority to those with a local connection to the local area;
- taking account of the needs of mobile workers such as those in the armed forces; and
- where the child to adult ratio could be lowered on an estate where there is high child density or, conversely, young single people could be integrated into an estate via this route.

1 Welsh Code, paras 3.69.

4.175 Providing somewhat more practical guidance, the Chartered Institute of Housing (CIH) has suggested that proposals for local lettings policies should set out the following1:

• a clear definition of the objective(s) to be achieved, backed up by clear evidence;
• a method which is likely to achieve the objective(s);
• a potential (equality) impact assessment;
• how the scheme will be monitored and who will be involved;
• mechanisms of reporting and reviewing the scheme;
• how the views of local communities have shaped the scheme; and
• a clear exit strategy.

1 Allocations and local flexibility: A Practice brief (CIH, March 2010).

4.176 A survey conducted by CIH in late 2013 found that1:

‘Local lettings policies have been used by organisations to achieve a wide variety of housing management and policy objectives. They allow properties to be allocated to certain categories of applicants, whether or not they fall within the reasonable preference categories, provided that overall the landlord is able to demonstrate compliance with statutory requirements. Local lettings policies can be used on new developments or in existing communities having regard to housing management considerations such as the social mix of tenants, density, age range, and vulnerability of tenants. They may also be used to encourage working people or people who contribute to their local community through volunteering to move to a particular area2.’

1 New approaches to allocations (CIH, June 2014), p 10.

2 Local housing authorities in England seeking an understanding of how local lettings policies and schemes are being operated by others may also find helpful material in the results of a research survey published by DCLG in July 2009: Exploring local authority policy and practice on housing allocations (DCLG, July 2009), chapter 5.

4.177 The Welsh Code suggests that any local lettings policies should have clear aims linked to community sustainability and be supported by clear evidence of the need for the approach being taken1.

1 Welsh Code, para 3.72.

4.178 All local housing authorities are reminded by the statutory guidance that local lettings arrangements must not be used in such a way that there will be a failure to meet the requirement to give a reasonable preference to statutorily specified groups. In other words, an allocation scheme may include local lettings policies provided that:

• they do not dominate the scheme; and
• overall, the scheme operates to give reasonable preference to those in the statutory reasonable preference categories over those who are not1.

4.179 Allocation Schemes

Local lettings schemes in court

4.179 Two different types of local lettings schemes have recently come before the courts. In R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council¹, the claimant challenged a policy whereby 20% of all available lettings were set aside for ‘working households’ and ‘model tenants’². The scheme was challenged on the grounds that the provisions were unlawfully discriminatory against women with childcare responsibilities, the disabled, and the elderly, under the Equality Act 2010, s 19³; the provisions were unlawfully discriminatory under Art 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), in conjunction with Art 8 ECHR⁴; the public sector equality duty had not been complied with⁵; and Children Act 2004, s 11⁶ had been breached. The claim was allowed in the Administrative Court on all four grounds. However, the local housing authority’s appeal to the Court of Appeal was allowed in part. The Court of Appeal found that any discrimination arising from the scheme was justified and that the local housing authority had had the Children Act 2004, s 11 duty in mind. Although the court had concerns regarding the degree of consideration given to the public sector equality duty when the priority scheme had been implemented, it held that there was no need to grant substantive relief given that the scheme was under review⁷.

4.180 In R (C) v Islington London Borough Council¹, the local housing authority operated a local lettings policy which prioritised the letting of new homes to people currently living on the estate on which they were built. The claimant argued that this unlawfully discriminated against the homeless and victims of domestic violence, who were more likely to be women. The Administrative Court dismissed this ground of challenge (although the claim was upheld on other grounds):

‘... in the context of the 2015 scheme as a whole, the effect of the local lettings policy, as was intended, has a beneficial effect upon the provision of social housing within the borough, in that it facilitates the securing of reasonable preferences to those, including the claimant, who are entitled to it under s 166A(3) of the 1996 Act. It may be that it is always possible to think of possible ways in which to create less intrusive policies in general. However, I do not consider that the defendant's local lettings policy could be any less intrusive, in the sense of being less detrimental to the claimant, and still maintain its legitimate aim. Certainly, the defendant's decision on this point, is not manifestly without reasonable foundation. Furthermore, in relation to the issue of proportionality, I consider that, bearing in mind the extent to which the local lettings policy contributes to that aim, the local lettings policy does strike a fair and proportionate balance between the severity of the consequences for the claimant, and the importance of the aim².’

Particular types of accommodation

4.181 Beyond local lettings schemes, three specific forms of accommodation may be suitable for special treatment under these statutory powers in an allocation scheme:

- accommodation with linked support;
- accommodation particularly suited for agricultural workers; and
- accommodation subject to an application from a former tenant or other occupier of it.

4.182 Each of these three suggested categories requires careful consideration.

Accommodation with linked support

4.183 Certain applicants may not only seek accommodation but also have needs for support1. Where an applicant’s household includes a child who needs accommodation on medical and welfare grounds, local housing authorities are advised to consult with children’s services about the appropriate level of priority, what support needs are present, and how those support needs will be met2. Where applicants for an allocation are cared for by people who do not live with them, local housing authorities are advised that the applicant will need a spare bedroom (for overnight stays)3.

1 Welsh Code, para 3.51.
2 The guidance Working together to safeguard children: A guide to inter-agency working to safeguard and promote the welfare of children requires co-operation between departments in the same authority, but the duty of co-operation imposed by Children Act 1989, s 27 does not apply to two departments within the same authority: R (M); R (A) v Islington London Borough Council [2016] EWHC 332 (Admin). [2016] HLR 19.
3 Welsh Code, para 3.127.

4.184 Single parents aged under 18, who are not living with their parents, should be offered semi-independent accommodation with support. A joint assessment of the applicant’s housing, care and support needs should be undertaken by the housing and children’s services departments, provided that the applicant consents to the involvement of children’s services. It would be unusual for a young single parent to be given an independent tenancy, but arrangements should be made for the young parent to move on from supported accommodation as he or she reaches adulthood1. Local housing authorities should not be deterred by the legal problems associated with the granting of a tenancy to a minor: children’s services authorities may underwrite the tenancy agreement, and the tenancy itself can be treated as a trust for land (giving the minor the beneficial interest) or as a contract for a lease2.

4.185 Allocation Schemes

4.185 Access to the allocation of accommodation with support should also be available for rough sleepers and people at risk of sleeping rough. Many rough sleepers will need support with other problems: mental health, alcohol or drug problems, and basic life skills. Local housing authorities should work with adult care services and (in Wales) Supporting People Teams to provide such support1. Where sex offenders are allocated accommodation, there should be joint working with the police, probation services, adult care services, health professionals and other bodies to manage any risk to the community2.

Accommodation particularly suited for agricultural workers

4.186 Local housing authorities are required by the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976 to use their best endeavours to provide accommodation for displaced agricultural workers where they are satisfied that the dwelling house from which the worker is displaced is needed to accommodate another agricultural worker, that the farmer cannot provide suitable alternative accommodation for the displaced worker and that the displaced worker needs to be rehoused in the interests of efficient agriculture1. Local housing authorities should include within their allocation schemes a policy statement in respect of the priority that will be accorded to displaced agricultural workers2.

Accommodation subject to an application from a former tenant or other current occupier

4.187 The exercise of these statutory powers to separate from the general allocation provisions certain accommodation which would otherwise be available for letting might be particularly apt where an applicant seeks the specific allocation of just one property – the home in which he or she is already living1. For example, this might arise where the applicant:

• has married an existing tenant and they both seek the grant of a fresh tenancy into their joint names;
• is a former joint tenant and the joint tenancy has ended;
• is a relation of the previous tenant who has died without there being a right of succession;
• has otherwise occupied the particular property for a considerable time; or
• was placed in the accommodation under a non-secure tenancy but now wishes to be granted a secure or introductory tenancy of the same property2.

1 See 1.28 et seq for an introduction to this topic.
2 The English Homelessness Code of Guidance (MHCLG, February 2018) recommends that local housing authorities give consideration to allocating temporary accommodation under a secure or assured tenancy, especially where ‘a household has been living in a particular property for anything other than a short-term emergency stay’: para 2.50.

4.188 Unless the local housing authority has used the power in HA 1996, Pt 6, to identify in its scheme the special treatment of applicants in such cases, distinct from the general allocation provisions, it would be in difficulty in lawfully allocating the specific property to the applicant, given the entitlement of many others to a ‘reasonable preference’ in allocation. The position will be all the more acute where a scheme provides that ‘all’ allocations will be by way of choice-based letting. A local housing authority will need to ensure that its scheme is framed sufficiently flexibly to take account of these particular cases.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(6)(b) (England), s 167(2E)(b) (Wales).

4.189 For example, when a former joint tenancy has ended, a local housing authority may be asked to decide whether to grant a sole tenancy to the former joint tenant who remains in the property. One of the joint tenants may have terminated the former joint tenancy by service of a notice to quit on the landlord\(^1\). Local housing authorities need to set out in their allocation schemes the circumstances in which they will exercise their discretion to grant a new sole tenancy in this situation\(^2\). Of course, if the couple are married, have a civil partnership, or have children, a family court has jurisdiction to decide that a joint tenancy should be transferred to a sole tenancy in one of the partners’ names and such a transfer made following the court’s decision is not subject to the allocation scheme\(^3\).

1 Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council v Monk [1992] 1 AC 478, HL.
3 Transfers made by virtue of Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s 24; Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984, s 17(1); Children Act 1989, Sch 1 para 1; and Civil Partnership Act 2004, Pt 2, Sch 5 are excluded from counting as allocations by HA 1996, s 160(2)(e) and (3)(d). See also 1.27. For transfers ordered under the Family Law Act 1996 see 1.27.

4.190 Similarly, when a secure tenant dies, and there is no entitlement to a statutory succession, local housing authorities may consider granting a tenancy to somebody who has been living with the tenant. To do so they must specifically provide for that scenario in their allocation schemes and set out the circumstances that they will take into account in determining applications\(^4\). For example, local housing authorities might consider granting a tenancy where the applicant is a former household member who was living with the tenant for the year prior to the tenant’s death, had been providing care for the tenant, or has accepted responsibility for the tenant’s dependants, and needs to live with them\(^5\). If the local housing authority has included a provision of this type in its allocation scheme, it should consider whether it might be utilised before it takes proceedings to recover possession of the particular property from the person in occupation\(^6\). An occupier who has been refused an allocation in these circumstances may be able to challenge the decision by way of judicial review\(^7\) or as a defence to possession proceedings\(^8\). For example, in one case, a mother and her children had not been living with the father (who was a social housing tenant) at the date of his death although they returned to his home shortly afterwards. On those facts there could be no statutory succession. The local allocation scheme provided for the possible allocation of a new tenancy of the same property to the non-successor in such exceptional circumstances. The local housing authority was found to have behaved unlawfully in not soliciting an application from the mother for consideration under that provision and its possession claim against her was dismissed.

1. R v Islington London Borough Council ex parte Blissett (unreported) 9 September 1997, QBD (noted at (1998) 75 P&CR D4) concerned an allocation scheme which provided for a deceased tenant’s same-sex partner to be offered a tenancy if they could establish 12 months’ residence. A judicial review challenge, based on a claim that the claimant’s evidence made out his fulfilment of that qualifying period, failed on the facts.

3. Leicester City Council v Shearer [2013] EWCA Civ 1467, CA.

4.191 Although not mentioned in the Codes, an allocation scheme should make provision for applications for allocation of specific properties where applicants were placed in their accommodation under a non-secure tenancy but now wish to be granted a secure or introductory tenancy of the same property. For example, an applicant for homelessness assistance who has been granted a non-secure tenancy of local housing authority accommodation under the main housing duty owed to homeless applicants under HA 1996, Pt 7 could apply to his or her local housing authority for a secure or introductory tenancy of that property. Likewise, a person who had a non-secure tenancy because the accommodation was provided as a term of his or her employment might seek a secure or introductory tenancy when the employment ended. A local housing authority could only allocate a secure tenancy to an applicant covered by these examples if its allocation scheme made provision for those circumstances or in the exercise of an overriding discretion.

3. HA 1996, s 159(3).

AVOIDING DISCRIMINATION AND ENHANCING EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY IN ALLOCATION SCHEMES

4.192 The statutory guidance on housing allocation reminds local housing authorities that their allocation schemes, and the detailed policies and procedures they contain, should take account of their statutory duties under equalities legislation and should not unlawfully discriminate between applicants. But neither of the Codes gives any detailed practical guidance on what compliance with these requirements means in the context of framing an allocation scheme.

The public sector equality duty

The equality duty at Equality Act 2010, s 149

4.193 The most important of the relevant statutory duties imposed by the Equality Act 2010 (EA 2010) is the public sector equality duty, which states that a public authority, such as a local housing authority, in the exercise of its functions must:

‘have due regard to the need to—

(a) eliminate discrimination, harassment, victimisation and any other conduct that is prohibited by or under this Act;

(b) advance equality of opportunity between persons who share a relevant protected characteristic and persons who do not share it;

(c) foster good relations between persons who share a relevant protected characteristic and persons who do not share it’. 1

1 Equality Act 2010, s 149.

4.194 Each of these elements is expanded upon in the various subsections of EA 2010, s 149. Having due regard to the need to advance equality of opportunity between people who share a relevant protected characteristic and people who do not involves having due regard to the need to:

• remove or minimise disadvantages suffered by persons who share a relevant protected characteristic that are connected to that characteristic;

• take steps to meet the needs of persons who share a relevant protected characteristic that are different from the needs of persons who do not share it; and

• encourage persons who share a relevant protected characteristic to participate in public life or in any other activity in which participation by such persons is disproportionately low’ 1.

1 Equality Act 2010, s 149(3).

4.195 Having due regard to the need to foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and people who do not involves having due regard to the need to:

• tackle prejudice; and

• promote understanding’ 1.

1 Equality Act 2010, s 149(5).

4.196 Complying with the public sector equality duty may involve treating some people more favourably than others 1. The ‘protected characteristics’ mentioned in the duty are age, disability, gender reassignment, marriage and civil partnership, pregnancy and maternity, race, religion or belief, sex, and sexual orientation.

1 Equality Act 2010, s 149(6).
2 Equality Act 2010, ss 5–12.

4.197 EA 2010, s 149 does not impose a statutory duty on public authorities requiring them to conduct a formal equality impact assessment when carrying out their functions. At the most, it imposes a duty on a public authority to consider undertaking an impact assessment, along with other means of gathering information, and to consider whether it is appropriate to have one in relation to the function or policy at issue, when it will or might have an impact on the protected characteristics. However, in order to avoid discrimination, and to be best able to demonstrate compliance with the public sector equality duty, when considering any substantial variation of its housing allocation scheme a local housing authority will probably first wish to undertake such an assessment.

1 For an illustration of the difficulties that can arise where an equality impact assessment inadequately addresses the impact of a proposed amendment to a housing allocation scheme, see R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council [2016] EWHC 841 (Admin) [2016] HLR 20, Admin Ct and [2017] EWCA Civ 1127, [2018] HLR 2, CA. For a helpful summary of other relevant cases, and academic commentary upon them, see The Public Sector Equality Duty and Equality Impact Assessments (House of Commons Library, 22 May 2014) at pp 19–21.

4.198 In Wales, the position is made more explicit. The Equality Act 2010 (Statutory Duties) (Wales) Regulations 2011 require that local housing authority policies should be subject to an equality impact assessment and the impact monitored to help ensure and demonstrate compliance with the objectives of the Equality Act 2010. The Welsh Code suggests that this is done by identifying any potential negative impact on people with protected characteristics and adopting an action plan to mitigate this impact.

Guidance on the public sector equality duty

4.199 The importance of the public sector equality duty in the context of housing allocation cannot be overstated. Comprehensive guidance is offered in The essential guide to the public sector equality duty. The public sector equality duty is given particular emphasis in Wales by supplementary regulations which are referred to in the Welsh Code, both the Local Government Association and the Chartered Institute of Housing have advised of the importance of complying with the duty.

3 Welsh Code, para 3.80.

4.200 The Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC) advises that decision-makers in public authorities need to:

- be aware of their responsibilities under the duty
- make sure they have adequate evidence (including from consultation, if appropriate) to enable them to understand the potential effects of their decisions on different people covered by the duty
- consciously and actively consider the relevant matters, in such a way that it influences decision-making
- do this before and at the time a decision is taken, not after the event
- be aware that the duty can’t be delegated to third parties who are carrying out functions on their behalf.

4.201 In relation to the protected characteristic of ‘disability’, the publication Housing and the Disability Equality Duty: A guide to the Disability Equality Duty and Disability Discrimination Act 2005 for the social housing sector from the former Disability Rights Commission (DRC) is still available online and offers considerable advice (and examples of good practice) on drawing-up allocation schemes. The Department of Health (DH) commissioned and published research on the experiences of the disabled in accessing choice-based letting schemes and associated guides for social landlords establishing such schemes and for people with learning difficulties who try to use them.

4.202 Regard must obviously be had to the various elements of the duty when taking strategic decisions about, for example, consultation arrangements on changes to allocation schemes and the formulation of their major elements. Local housing authorities should ensure that they consult with a wide range of groups when drawing up or revising their allocation schemes, and particularly engage with those who are currently under-represented in social housing. Translation of the scheme into different languages spoken in the local community is recommended. The Welsh Code advises that local housing authorities should be particularly sensitive to the housing needs of refugees, Gypsies and Travellers, people with disabilities, older people, people with mental health problems, and lesbian, gay and bisexual people.

4.203 Local housing authorities would also be well advised to monitor the operation of their current allocation schemes in order to identify and prevent discrimination and to review their schemes if particular groups are shown to be disadvantaged.

4.204 The Chartered Institute of Housing (CIH) has published useful guides for local housing authorities and other housing organisations seeking to give effect to the duties imposed by the equality legislation by carrying out equality impact assessments or an equality analysis of services.

4.205 Perhaps reflecting a new emphasis on the importance of measuring the likely equality impact of housing allocation schemes and policies, the UK Government published a free-standing equality statement on its latest statutory guidance about social housing allocation in England.

The public sector equality duty in the courts

4.206 Case law has established a number of general principles applicable to the exercise of the public sector equality duty. These include the following:

- The aim of the public sector equality duty is to ‘bring equality issues into the main-stream, so that they become an essential element in public decision making’.
- The duty is a matter of substance, not form. The decision-maker must be aware of the duty to have due regard to the relevant matters. The duty must be exercised ‘in substance, with rigour and with an open mind’. It is not about ‘ticking boxes’. Simply mentioning the statutory provision will not show that the duty has been performed, but equally ‘a failure to refer expressly to the statute does not of itself show that the duty has not been performed’.
- The duty must be fulfilled before and at the time that a particular policy is being considered. Ex post facto attempts to justify a decision as being consistent with the duty will not be enough to discharge the duty.
- The duty may involve a duty of inquiry: the public authority must be properly informed before taking the decision which may involve a duty to acquire the relevant material.
- The duty is a continuing one.
- The duty is non-delegable, although in practice another organisation may undertake practical steps to fulfil the duty.
- The requirement to have due regard is different from an obligation to give the equality considerations ‘specific weight. It is not a duty to achieve a particular result’.
Avoiding discrimination and enhancing equality of opportunity 4.208

- Whilst there must be ‘a rigorous consideration of the duty’\(^8\), if there has been a ‘proper and conscientious focus on the statutory criteria’, the court cannot interfere with the decision simply because it would have given greater weight to the equality implications of the decision than the decision maker did\(^9\).

- It is good practice for an adequate record to be kept showing the steps taken to fulfil the duty\(^10\).

\(^8\) Hotak v Southwark London Borough Council [2015] UKSC 30, [2015] WLR 1341 per Lord Neuberger at [74].

4.207 The application of the public sector equality duty in the context of a local lettings scheme was considered in R (C) v Islington London Borough Council. The local housing authority operated a local lettings policy which prioritised the letting of new homes to people currently living on the estate on which they were built. The claimant argued that this breached EA 2010, s 149. This ground of challenge was rejected. The judge noted that ‘when the original local lettings policy was introduced, the whole of the defendant’s housing allocation scheme, which necessarily included the local lettings policy, was subjected to an extensive analysis, for the express purpose of enabling the defendant to fulfil its statutory duty of having due regard to the public-sector equality duty’\(^2\). The judge found that ‘sufficiently rigorous and conscientious consideration’ had been given to the duty\(^3\).

\(^3\) [2017] EWHC 1288 (Admin), [2017] HLR 32, Admin Ct per Baker J at [104].

4.208 The role of the public sector equality duty in housing allocation decision-making was recently considered by the Court of Appeal in R (H) v
4.208 Allocation Schemes

Ealing London Borough Council1. This was a challenge to two priority schemes under which 20% of available lettings were set aside for ‘working households’ and ‘model tenants’. It was claimed that in enacting and maintaining the new policies the local housing authority had been in breach of the public sector equality duty. The court considered the degree of detail required for an equality impact assessment, noting that it was not a ‘precise mathematical exercise’ and that ‘a relatively broad brush approach’ may be sufficient2. The local housing authority in fact accepted that the initial equality impact assessment had been deficient and stated that it was undertaking a review. Although the court had concerns as to whether or not these deficiencies had been remedied, it decided not to grant any substantive relief given that a full review was underway.

2 [2017] EWCA Civ 1127, [2018] HLR 2, CA per Sir Terence Etherton MR at [113], quoting R (West Berkshire District Council) v Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government [2016] EWCA Civ 441, [2016] 1 WLR 3923 per Laws and Treacy LJJ at [83] and [85].

4.209 The courts have also confirmed that having due regard to the elements of the public sector equality duty is not only a requirement in relation to ‘strategic’ decision-making. It will, in relevant circumstances, also need to infuse and inform decision-making by local housing authorities in individual cases1. Those parts of a local housing allocation scheme which deal with the procedure on applications, and particularly with the making of decisions on applications, will need to indicate that those taking decisions have been alerted to the need to comply with the duty. In Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council v Norton2 the local housing authority had failed to consider the public sector equality duty in respect of the eviction (and possible rehousing) of a family which included a disabled person. The Court of Appeal said:

‘The decision of this appeal may serve to reinforce that which the courts have been saying for some time, calling on public authorities to face up to their obligations under [what is now] section 149 of the 2010 Act. It seems to me that the practical problem needs to be resolved by proper consideration being given by the Council, with the cooperation of the Norton family, to the question where they are to be accommodated in the future, whether under [HA 1996] Pt 7 or under Pt 6’.3

Non-discrimination

4.210 In addition to complying with the public sector equality duty, local housing authorities must ensure that their allocation schemes do not unlawfully discriminate under either the Equality Act 2010 or Art 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights.
Discrimination under the Equality Act 2010

4.211 Discrimination may be direct or indirect. Direct discrimination occurs when a person is treated less favourably than others because of a protected characteristic. It cannot be justified save where the protected characteristic is age. Indirect discrimination occurs when:

- A applies, or would apply, a provision, criterion, or practice;
- the provision, criterion, or practice puts, or would put, persons with a protected characteristic at a particular disadvantage when compared with persons without that characteristic;
- B has that protected characteristic;
- the provision, criterion, or practice puts, or would put B at that disadvantage; and
- A cannot show it to be a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.

1 EA 2010, s 13.
2 EA 2010, s 13.
3 EA 2010, s 19.

4.212 There is also a particular type of discrimination which relates only to disability. This applies where:

- A treats B, who is disabled, unfavourably;
- the unfavourable treatment is because of something arising in consequence of B's disability;
- A knows, or could reasonably have been expected to know, that B had that disability; and
- A cannot show that the treatment is a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.

1 EA 2010, s 15.

4.213 Section 29 EA 2010 prohibits discrimination by a person providing services to the public or exercising a public function. Section 33 of the Equality Act prohibits discrimination in the disposal of premises. In deciding whether a discriminatory provision is justified, the court must consider:

- Whether the measure pursues a sufficiently important objective.
- Whether the measure is rationally connected to that objective.
- Whether it is the least intrusive action that could be taken without unacceptably compromising that objective.
- Whether a fair balance has been struck between the importance of achieving the objective and the effect of the discrimination.

4.214 Allocation Schemes

4.214 Service-providers are subject to a duty to make reasonable adjustments in certain circumstances. Where a provision, criterion or practice of a service-provider puts a disabled person at a substantial disadvantage compared with a non-disabled person, the service-provider must take such steps as it is reasonable to take to avoid the disadvantage. They must also take reasonable steps to avoid disadvantage where a physical feature puts a disabled person at a substantial disadvantage, or to provide an auxiliary aid where the lack of such an aid puts a disabled person at a substantial disadvantage.

2. EA 2010, s 20(3) and Sch 2, para 2.
3. EA 2010, s 20(4) and (5) and Sch 2, para 2.

4.215 Controllers of premises to let are also subject to a duty to make reasonable adjustments in respect of a disabled person who is considering taking a letting of the premises. The duty will, however, only arise if they have received a request by or on behalf of the disabled person to do so. It may require them to take reasonable steps to avoid a disadvantage arising from a provision, criterion, or practice of the controller of premises to let, or to provide an auxiliary aid. It does not extend to removing disadvantages arising from physical features.

2. EA 2010, Sch 4, para 3(3).
3. EA 2010, Sch 4, para 3(5).
4. EA 2010, s 20 and Sch 4, para 3.

4.216 A failure to comply with the duty to make reasonable adjustments will constitute discrimination. The protected characteristics under the Equality Act are age, disability, gender reassignment, marriage and civil partnership, pregnancy and maternity, race, religion or belief, sex, and sexual orientation.

1. EA 2010, s 21(2).
2. EA 2010, s 4. EA 2010, Pt 3 does not apply to the protected characteristics of age, so far as relating to a person under 18, or civil partnership: EA 2010, s 28(1). EA 2010, Pt 4 does not apply to the protected characteristics of age or civil partnership: EA 2010, s 32(1).

Discrimination under Article 14 ECHR

4.217 Discrimination is also prohibited by Art 14 ECHR but only where it impacts upon ‘the enjoyment’ of other Convention rights. Article 14 provides:

‘The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.’

It is not necessary to show a breach of this other right but the matter must have a connection, which is more than tenuous, to the ‘core values’ which the right protects. The right most likely to be applicable in housing allocation decision-making is Art 8, the right to respect for a person’s private and family life, home, and correspondence. In a number of decisions the courts have accepted that Art 8 is engaged in housing allocation cases. However, a recent Court of Appeal decision has cast doubt on the subject, with two of the three judges stating (obiter) that it was not engaged and the third judge finding...

that it was engaged in respect of one provision of the allocation scheme (which affected single parent families who were not in secure accommodation), but not in relation to another (which concerned families who were already housed under secure tenancies). However, the court indicated that it had only heard limited argument on the point and it appears that relevant cases may not have been cited so the matter cannot be regarded as closed.

3 R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council [2017] EWCA Civ 1127, [2018] HLR 2, CA per Sir Terence Etherton MR at [101]–[102], Davis LJ at [128]–[130] and Underhill LJ at [131]–[133].

4.218 The characteristics protected by Art 14 include not only sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, and birth, but also ‘other status’. A ‘wide and generous’ approach will be taken to whether or not the claimant has some ‘other status’.

The courts have tended to focus more on whether alleged differential treatment is justified than on the question of status. The Court of Appeal has recently observed that ‘if the alleged discrimination falls within the scope of a Convention right, the question of status will normally be answered in the claimant’s favour’. Examples of ‘other status’ include the status of being homeless, or a care leaver or a private rented sector tenant as opposed to a secure tenant.

6 R (Fartun Osman) v Harrow London Borough Council [2017] EWHC 274 (Admin). At the time of writing there was an outstanding application for permission to appeal against this decision.

4.219 When deciding whether a discriminatory provision or practice is justified, the court will consider the same four-stage test which applies to discrimination under the Equality Act 2010 (see 4.213 above). However, as discussed below (at 4.220–4.226), the standard of scrutiny to be applied is not necessarily the same.

1 Bank Mellat v Her Majesty’s Treasury (No. 2) [2013] UKSC 39, [2014] AC 700, SC per Lord Sumption at [20]. It was confirmed that this approach applies to claims of discrimination under Art 14 ECHR by the Supreme Court in Breaster v Northern Ireland Local Government Officer’s Superannuation Committee [2017] UKSC 8, [2016] 1 WLR 519, SC per Lord Kerr at [66].
When the court is considering whether a measure which is discriminatory under either the Equality Act 2010 or Art 14 ECHR is justified, how strict a level of scrutiny should it apply? Should it treat the decision-maker’s actions with a significant degree of respect, upholding the policy unless it is manifestly without reasonable foundation? Or should it apply a more exacting test?

4.221 It is well-established that, ‘when it comes to general measures of economic or social strategy’, policy choices by the legislature will generally be respected unless they are manifestly without reasonable foundation’. Thus in the context of state benefits, a difference of treatment amounting to discrimination will be upheld unless it is ‘manifestly without reasonable foundation’.

1 Stec v United Kingdom (2006) 43 EHRR 1017 at [51].

4.222 Local housing authorities are distinct from national governments, and housing allocation schemes do not amount to macroeconomic and/or social policy. However, it is well-established that ‘housing allocation policy is a difficult exercise which requires not only social and political sensitivity and judgment, but also local expertise and knowledge’ which local housing authorities are best placed to undertake.

4.223 The approaches taken by the court have varied:

- In R (HA) v Ealing London Borough Council, the standard of scrutiny applied was not specified, although it appeared to be somewhat higher than ‘manifestly without reasonable foundation’. The judge noted that ‘the defendant, as a public body, is entitled to the appropriate measure of respect in relation to its decision’ but found that ‘no rational justification’ had been advanced for the discriminatory treatment.
- In R (YA) v Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council, the parties agreed that ‘there was a wider margin of appreciation in this case for any justification and that the burden of establishing the justification is on the defendant’.
- In R (Fartun Osman) v Harrow London Borough Council the scrutiny applied appeared to go beyond ‘manifestly without reasonable foundation’. The judge found that the policy was not ‘so ill-founded’ or ‘manifestly unfair or otherwise disproportionate’ as to be unlawful under Art 14.
- In R (C) v Islington London Borough Council, the local housing authority argued that each of the four parts of the test should be answered in its favour unless the policy under challenge was ‘manifestly without reasonable justification’. The claimant argued that, whilst that may be the correct test to apply to the first three questions, the last question was essentially a matter to be determined by the court. The judge accepted the claimant’s position, whilst recognizing that ‘significant weight should be accorded to the defendant’s decision’ given that ‘the policy also concerns the allocation of finite resources, namely social housing, by a body that not only has considerable expertise and experience in these matters, but has been entrusted with this task by Parliament’.

• In R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council 10, the judge at first instance held that the ‘manifestly without reasonable foundation’ test was insufficiently exacting, ‘although of course due regard must be paid to the choices facing the council when distributing scarce resources like housing’ 11.

The judge’s decision in R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council 12 was challenged in the Court of Appeal 13. Unfortunately, however, the court did not decide the matter either way, finding simply that the judge had not been entitled to reject the justification defence for the reasons given. The matter therefore remains uncertain.

1 [2015] EWHC 2375 (Admin), [2016] PTSR 16, HC.
4 [2016] EWHC 1850 (Admin), [2016] HLR 39, HC per Mr Peter Marquand at [75].
5 [2016] EWHC 1850 (Admin), [2016] HLR 39, HC per Mr Peter Marquand at [84]–[85].
6 [2017] EWHC 274 (Admin), Admin Ct. At the time of writing there was an outstanding application for permission to appeal against this decision.
7 [2017] EWHC 274 (Admin), Admin Ct per Robin Purchas QC at [73].
11 [2016] EWHC 841 (Admin), [2016] HLR 20, Admin Ct per HHJ Waksman QC at [99]. The judge proceeded to find that the measure was not justified even if the manifestly without reasonable foundation test was applied.

4.224 The ‘manifestly without reasonable foundation’ threshold would appear to have no purchase in respect of justification defences under the Equality Act 2010. It is well-established that when the court is considering the four-stage test (see 4.213), it does not limit itself to a rationality assessment but must reach its own judgment as to whether the conditions for justification are met’. The reasons given for a discriminatory measure will not be uncritically accepted 2.

4.225 Allocation Schemes

4.225 There are several reasons for this distinction. Article 14 ECHR is potentially open-ended, in that the protected characteristics include ‘other status’, in contrast to the protected characteristics under EA 2010, which are narrowly defined. Article 14 ECHR applies only to public authorities, unlike EA 2010. The ‘manifestly without reasonable foundation’ threshold derives from decisions as to what latitude should be given to national governments in questions of macroeconomic and/or social policy whereas EA 2010 protects individuals’ rights not to be discriminated against.

4.226 Notwithstanding these differences, it has recently been argued on behalf of local housing authorities that the ‘manifestly without reasonable foundation’ level of scrutiny applies to justification defences under EA 2010. This submission was rejected by the court in R (XC) v Southwark London Borough Council. The same argument was made by the local housing authority in R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council and it was hoped that some clarification might be forthcoming from this decision. However, the Court of Appeal did not decide the point. Without clear authority to show that the ‘manifestly without reasonable foundation’ test is applicable, the preferred view must be that it is not.

Guidance on avoiding discrimination

4.227 The former Commission for Racial Equality’s Code of Practice for Racial Equality in Housing (of which there were separate versions for England, Scotland and Wales respectively) contained the following examples of potential unlawful discrimination on grounds of ‘race’ relating to social housing allocation schemes (in the version for England):

‘A council generally allocates the worst properties to homeless applicants, whereas tenants transferring to housing association accommodation receive better properties. Ethnic minority households are disproportionately represented among those whom the council has a duty to house because they are homeless. This policy would be unlawful direct discrimination, unless the council could show it to be a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim. It may also be unlawful under the Housing Act 1996’ (Example 30).

‘A housing association’s allocation policy gives priority for lettings to tenants’ sons and daughters. If the racial profile of tenants does not reflect the racial profile of people in need of housing in the association’s catchment area, the policy could disadvantage prospective tenants from under-represented racial groups and could amount to unlawful indirect discrimination. It would therefore need to be carefully considered, and the justification for the policy tested against any possible discriminatory effects’ (Example 31).

‘A local council (or housing association) fails to make sure that information about its lettings services reaches people from all racial groups; for example, by not advertising the service in outlets which it knows are preferred by ethnic minority residents. This could amount to indirect discrimination’ (Example 35).
Avoiding discrimination and enhancing equality of opportunity 4.230

‘A CRE inquiry into a major public sector landlord’s “choice-based” lettings scheme found that:
• the city council had not done a race equality impact assessment of the scheme;
• it had not consulted affected groups and agencies in the community adequately;
• ethnic monitoring of applications and allocations was poor; and
• information about the new scheme was not available in relevant languages.

The CRE concluded that there had been contraventions of the duty to promote race equality, and that these failings should be rectified’ (Example 38).

‘Analysis of a council’s housing allocations shows that people from certain racial groups are consistently offered inferior accommodation. This constitutes direct discrimination’ (Example 39).

1 All the versions of the CRE’s Code are available on the EHRC website.
2 This appears to be an error: the discrimination described would constitute indirect discrimination.

4.228 The former statutory guidance in the Disability Rights Commission’s publication Duty to Promote Disability Equality: Statutory Code of Practice England and Wales also contained a number of examples of unlawful discrimination on the grounds of disability in the housing and social housing area.

1 Disability Rights Commission, October 2006. The statutory guidance on gender discrimination was Gender Equality Duty: Code of Practice for England and Wales (Equal Opportunities Commission, November 2006). All of these Codes are available on the EHRC website.

Examples of court decisions on discrimination

4.229 An example of unlawful discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation is the case of Rodriguez v Minister of Housing of Gibraltar in which a tenant asked her social landlord to agree to make her long-term same sex partner a joint tenant of her home (so that her partner would be secure in the event of her death). The allocation policy was only to agree to such requests if the couple were married or had children. The landlord claimed that the policy was not discriminatory because a heterosexual childless couple would also have been refused. Alternatively, if there was discrimination, it was justified by the aim to support families and children. The Privy Council held that the policy did discriminate against same-sex partners and that there was no rational justification for that discrimination.

4.230 Issues about discrimination in the housing allocation context have become more prominent as local housing authorities take advantage of the opportunities to increase or reduce preference or create qualifying classes. The court have considered claims of discrimination in a number of different schemes:
• In R (HA) v Ealing London Borough Council the local housing authority had adopted a qualifying criterion based on local residence which operated to exclude women who had fled into the local housing authority’s area from elsewhere to seek refuge from domestic violence. The criterion was successfully challenged on the basis that it constituted unlawful indirect discrimination against women contrary to Equality Act 2010, s 29.

• In R (YA) v Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council\(^1\) a qualifying class which excluded applicants who had been guilty of unacceptable behaviour was, although discriminatory against care leavers, justified as it improved the environment for other residents and reduced the risk of the council spending limited resources on legal proceedings to evict misbehaving tenants.

• In R (Fartun Osman) v Harrow London Borough Council\(^2\) the local housing authority revised its scheme with the effect that overcrowded households in the private rented sector had their priority reduced to Band C whilst overcrowded households with secure tenancies remained in Band A. The judge found that the discrimination was a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim and therefore justified.

• In R (XC) v Southwark London Borough Council\(^3\) the judge found that the award of a priority star to applicants who were in voluntary or paid work indirectly discriminated against disabled persons and women. However, the discrimination had the legitimate aim of creating sustainable communities and encouraging residents to contribute to the local community; the system was rationally connected to those objectives; and the measure adopted was the least intrusive to achieve those aims. Of relevance was the fact that the authority had retained a discretion to waive the practice in exceptional circumstances.

• In R (C) v Islington London Borough Council\(^4\) a local lettings policy which gave local residents priority for new homes on existing estates was found to be discriminatory but justified when looked at in the context of the scheme as a whole. The court held that it should accord significant weight to the authority’s decision as the matter concerned the allocation of finite resources by a body with considerable expertise which had been entrusted by Parliament with the task.

• In R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council\(^5\) the Court of Appeal allowed in part an appeal against a judge’s finding that two schemes which set aside a number of lettings for ‘working households’ and ‘model tenants’ was unlawfully discriminatory. It was conceded that each scheme was indirectly discriminatory but the court found that the judge had not been entitled to reject the council’s justification defence. In finding that the schemes were not the least intrusive way of achieving the legitimate aim in question, the judge had relied on other allocation schemes which were radically different from Ealing’s and had stepped ‘over the line of unacceptable incursion by the court into the practical running of a housing allocation scheme’.

Avoiding discrimination and enhancing equality of opportunity 4.233

7 In Complaint against London Borough of Brent, 16 010 013, 24 March 2017, the Local Government Ombudsman considered an allocations policy which reserved 80% of lettings for homeless households in temporary accommodation was found to be lawful. However, it appears that no discrimination arguments were raised.

Allocation and migration

4.231 Despite the measures that local housing authorities are – or should be – taking to involve local communities in setting, or at least understanding, priorities in housing allocation and the need to avoid discrimination and inequality, recent surveys have found that many people perceive that the way that social housing is allocated is unfair. A UK Government-commissioned study published in 2009 found that less than a quarter (23%) of the public agreed that the way social housing is allocated is fair.

4.232 A particularly popular misconception has been that the majority of available social housing is allocated to new arrivals from overseas. Research commissioned by the EHRC, for example, identified anxieties about housing allocation schemes putting British families at a disadvantage.

Readers seeking to probe further the relationship between allocation and migration may find helpful material in Immigration and the Access to Social Housing in the UK, CEP Discussion Paper No 1264 and Migrants and Housing in the UK: Experiences and Impacts, The Migration Observatory, Oxford University, September 2015.

4.233 In fact, studies have consistently shown this to be incorrect. The aforementioned research commissioned by the EHRC found that less than 2% of all social housing residents are people who have moved to Britain in the last five years and that nine out of ten people who live in social housing were born in the UK. An earlier study had found that, on the available data, relatively small numbers of new immigrants and migrants were accessing the social rented sector. Research from 2012 showed that UK-born and foreign-born individuals have similar levels of participation in social housing (about 17–18% of each group live in social housing). A recent note produced by the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology confirmed that less than a fifth of migrants live in social rented accommodation and, when differences in household structure, area of residence, and economic circumstances are taken into account, migrant households are significantly less likely than comparable UK-born households to live in social housing. The note concluded that 'There is no evidence that social housing allocation favours migrants'. The proportion of social lettings to UK nationals remained virtually unchanged from 2012–13 (91%) to 2016–17 (90%) for general needs accommodation.

4.234 In an attempt to correct these misconceptions, emphasis has been placed on improving the transparency of social housing allocations. The Welsh Code recommends that local housing authorities provide regular, accurate and generalised information on how social housing is allocated and how waiting lists are managed, working actively to dispel any myths and misconceptions which may arise1. The Supplementary English Code advises that2:

‘It is important that applicants and the wider community understand how social housing is allocated in their area, and that they know who is getting that social housing, so that they can see that the allocation system is fair and the authority is complying with its allocation scheme. We would encourage housing authorities to consider how accurate and anonymised information on waiting list applicants and lettings outcomes could be routinely published, to strengthen public confidence in the fairness of their allocation scheme.’

2 Supplementary English Code, para [28]. See also Welsh Code, para 3.57.

4.235 In October 2013 local housing authorities were encouraged to do more to improve the data collected and made available on social housing lettings. The UK Government told local housing authorities in England that1:

‘Good quality data on social lettings is critical to enabling local authorities to effectively discharge their functions and understand how their assets are used and allocated. Local authorities should have up-to-date information about prospective tenants’ characteristics, including nationality and immigration status, in order to ascertain their priority and eligibility for social housing. In the spirit of transparency and public accountability, this information should be readily available.’ [Emphasis added]

4.236 In light of the referendum vote to leave the European Union, the future relationship between social housing allocation and EU migrants is very uncertain. However, despite the fact that access to social housing was one of the topics raised by the UK Government during the EU Membership Negotiations of February 2016, only 4% of new social lettings each year go to EU migrants. This means that, even if new rules meant EU migrants were denied social tenancies, the effect on supply generally would be ‘very small’.

Social housing allocation and human rights 4.240

SOCIAL HOUSING ALLOCATION AND HUMAN RIGHTS

4.237 The only ‘human rights’ directly enforceable in the courts in England and Wales are those set out in Sch 1 of the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998). As explained later in this book, those rights can be deployed in some circumstances to force public bodies to arrange accommodation for particularly vulnerable individuals. However, none of those specified human rights confers on any person a right to obtain a home in social housing.

1 See 20.110 et seq.

4.238 This does not mean that the HRA 1998 can be ignored by those concerned in the allocation of social housing. The Equality and Human Rights Commission has included valuable coverage of the interface between the HRA 1998 and social housing allocation in its current guidance for social landlords.

1 Human Rights at home: guidance for social housing providers (EHRC, March 2011) at pp 161–9. The guidance was referred to and applied in R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council [2016] EWHC 841 (Admin), [2016] HLR 20, Admin Ct at [86]. An appeal against this decision was allowed by the Court of Appeal: [2017] EWCA Civ 1127, [2018] HLR 2, CA.

4.239 Perhaps the most obvious point of interface between the HRA 1998 and the legislative scheme governing housing allocation in HA 1996, Pt 6, arises if a local housing authority or other social landlord performs its public, mainly statutory, functions relating to social housing allocation in a discriminatory way. That may trigger the application of HRA 1998, Sch 1, Art 14 which provides that the other rights protected in Sch 1 ‘shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status’.

1 See 4.217 et seq.

4.240 The human rights protected by HRA 1998, Sch 1 also include the right, in Art 6, to a fair and just determination of a dispute about civil rights within a reasonable time. That has been interpreted as including the right to obtain a reasonably prompt enforcement of a judgment. Indeed, the benefit of such a court judgment may become a person’s possession protected by Art 1 of Protocol 1. So where, as in the UK, the state has provided a statutory system of distribution of social housing, a failure to comply with a court judgment requiring the provision of such social housing to an individual may be a breach of Art 6 and/or of Art 1 of Protocol 1.

4.241 Allocation Schemes

ALLOCATION SCHEMES AND THE BEST INTERESTS OF CHILDREN

4.241 Local authorities, including local housing authorities, must make arrangements for ensuring that their functions are discharged having regard to the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of children1. This applies not only to the formulation of general policies but also to decisions in individual cases2.

1 Children Act 2004, s 11.

4.242 The Supreme Court has explained that the Children Act 2004, s 11 duty requires decision-makers to treat the best interests of children as a primary consideration, although not as ‘the’ primary consideration3. The Children Act 2004, s 11 duty means that local housing authorities who are formulating or amending their allocation schemes must do so with regard to the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of children. ‘Welfare’ is to be given a broad meaning, ‘encompassing physical, psychological, social, educational and economic welfare’2. The local housing authority must not simply ‘safeguard’ the welfare of children but actively promote it4. It is also likely that decision-makers will be obliged to interpret housing allocation schemes consistently with the Children Act 2004, s 11 duty4.

1 ZH (Tanzania) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2011] UKSC 4, [2011] 2 AC 166, SC at [22]–[26].

4.243 The Children Act 2004, s 11 duty also requires local housing authorities to treat the best interests of any children involved as a primary consideration when making decisions in individual cases. On the facts of one case, that was met by the housing department contacting social services when considering what points to award the application1. The obligation was further satisfied by welfare categories which awarded points for households that included someone with ‘a need for settled accommodation on welfare or medical grounds who cannot reasonably be expected to find accommodation for themselves in the future’. It was held that this was ‘clearly wide enough to include consideration of children’2. However, in another case, the obligation had not been met: the local housing authority had been required to identify the principal needs of the children and then have regard to the real risks to their safety and well-being, but had not done so3.

2 R (Woolfe) v Islington London Borough Council [2016] EWHC 1907 (Admin), [2016] HLR 42, Admin Ct at [42]–[54]. This interpretation may be seen as support for the proposition that housing allocation schemes must be construed consistently with Children Act 2004, s 11 as far as possible.

3 R (KS) v London Borough of Haringey [2018] EWHC 587 (Admin) per HHJ Walden-Smith (sitting as a Judge of the High Court) at [62].

4.244 The Children Act 2004, s 11 duty may well involve the housing department seeking the active involvement of its Children’s Services department in its housing allocation decision-making. Whilst the duty under s 27 of the Children Act 1989 which requires co-operation between authorities does not apply to two departments within the same authority, a similar degree of co-operation between such departments is required by the statutory guidance Working together to safeguard children: A guide to inter-agency working to safeguard and promote the welfare of children 1.

1 R (M); R (A) v Islington London Borough Council [2016] EWHC 332 (Admin), [2016] HLR 19, Admin Ct.

4.245 This duty of co-operation was considered, and found to have been breached, in R (KS) v London Borough of Haringey 1. In that case, a social worker had made clear to the local housing authority that the children’s accommodation was unsuitable. The judge found that local housing authority had been obliged, in response to this, to make a decision based upon the issues highlighted by the social worker. The local housing authority’s decision that the family should simply remain where they were was deficient. The duty of co-operation was also breached in R (J and L) v Hillingdon London Borough Council 2. This case concerned a severely disabled 8-year-old boy (L) living with his mother in unsuitable accommodation in which his health and safety were at risk. The Children’s Services department had completed a Child and Family assessment which, as the judge found, concluded that the risks to L were tolerable pending alternative accommodation which could be provided through “the usual housing application and bidding process” 3. The local housing authority obtained a medical assessment which stated that the current accommodation was suitable and in reliance on that assessed the claimant as having no identified medical or housing need. As a consequence, she was not allowed onto the housing register. The judge found that there had been a failure of co-operation between the local housing authority and Children’s Services:

- the Child and Family assessment failed to clearly communicate to the local housing authority that Children’s Services were not going to accommodate the family because his needs would be met through the allocation process;
- the local housing authority’s decision letter contained no reference to, or apparent consideration of, the recommendations in the Child and Family assessment (or the previous Occupational Therapy assessments);
- the local housing authority’s decision letter failed ‘so comprehensively’ to grasp the nature of the risks to L and how they were to be addressed, as set out in the Child and Family assessment, that it was ‘impossible’ to conclude that there had been any co-operation with the Children’s Services department; and
- Children’s Services had then failed to pick up on the negative housing allocation decision, which should have prompted a referral back to Children’s Services for further consideration⁴.

4. [2017] EWHC 3411 (Admin), Admin Ct per Nicklin J at [60]–[69].

4.246 In contrast, the Children Act 2004, s 11 duty was found to be satisfied in another case¹ where:

- the local housing authority had discussed the scheme, including in particular the welfare points element, with the children’s services department prior to its introduction;
- the housing department had a joint working protocol with the children’s services department; and
- when considering whether points should be allocated on welfare grounds, the housing department would contact the children’s services department.

4.247 As when it comes to considering compliance with the public sector equality duty², judges should not be ‘too exacting’ when deciding whether or not the Children Act 2004, s 11 duty has been breached³. However, it should be clear that ‘proper consideration’ has been given to the relevant matters: the local housing authority must be able to show that the obligation has been properly discharged⁴. This was not shown in R (J and L) v Hillingdon London Borough Council⁵ where the decision letter did ‘not even recognise’ the Children Act 2004, s 11 duty ‘as a factor in the decision-making’⁶. The court will not ‘assume’ that a local housing authority has performed its functions conscientiously⁷. Whilst the court will not take over the role of decision-maker, it will ‘scrutinise with care’ what the local housing authority has done⁸.

THE ROLE OF ‘DISCRETION’ IN ALLOCATION SCHEMES

4.248 One of the most difficult tasks in framing an allocation scheme is to determine the extent to which flexibility should be retained, on the part of identified officers of the local housing authority, to depart from the normal rules or to deal with exceptional or unusual cases. Sadly, the judicial guidance is not altogether clear on the extent to which the inclusion of a broad discretion is lawful, or the absence of such unlawful.
At one extreme it is plain that a scheme cannot lawfully allow so much discretion to depart from the rules that, in reality, there is no scheme other than the exercise of discretion on a case-by-case basis. The examples of allocation schemes which were unlawful in that respect include:

- R v Islington London Borough Council ex p Reilly & Mannix. That case was concerned with a points-based system. There was discretion to award as many additional points as were needed to bring a particular household to the head of the queue and to gain the needed priority. The judge said:

  ‘... the residual discretion is not a satisfactory way of bridging the gap between the outcome of the category-based points calculation and the true assessment of need. It is too vague and uncertain and results in a disproportionately large element of need being subject to assessment on an undefined and unguided discretionary basis.’

- R (Cali) v London Borough of Waltham Forest. The local housing authority had adopted a banding scheme and choice-based letting. The published scheme gave unfettered power to a panel of officers to move an applicant from one category to another, depending upon their perceived housing need. Applying Reilly & Mannix the judge said:

  ‘First, the practice identified appears to be the exercise of a broad discretion to promote a household from one category to another. ... In the absence of published criteria, the mechanism described in the letter depends excessively on discretion ... As in Reilly & Mannix, the discretion identified ... is too vague and would result in decisions as to comparative need being taken on “an undefined and unguided discretionary basis” which could lead to inconsistency and arbitrary results.’

In the second case, the effect of introducing an unlimited discretion was that the published allocation scheme failed to meet the statutory obligation that it must set out the local regime for determining priorities.

A more difficult question is whether the terms of an allocation scheme may remove or exclude all possibility of the exercise of residual discretion, even in an exceptional case. This issue arises particularly in the context of setting qualifying classes for local allocation of social housing. The statutory guidance suggests that there may be exceptional circumstances where it is necessary to disapply the generally adopted qualifying criteria in the case of individual applicants. It encourages local housing authorities to ‘make explicit provision for dealing with exceptional cases within their qualification rules’, offering the example of the need to move an intimidated witness quickly. This guidance is no doubt intended to meet one of the criticisms made in respect of the equivalent pre-2003 statutory scheme which had the effect that:

‘... where an applicant falls within a class of non-qualifying persons (eg persons with rent arrears), the housing authority rejects the application and does not make a balanced decision based on consideration of the particular circumstances of the case (eg weigh the degree of housing need against the severity of the rent arrears)\(^1\)

\(^1\) English Code, para 3.25.

4.251 This issue has been further developed in the Supplementary English Code issued in December 2013. Under the heading ‘Providing for exceptions’ that guidance states:\(^1\)

‘19. It is important that housing authorities retain the flexibility to take proper account of special circumstances. This can include providing protection to people who need to move away from another area, to escape violence or harm; as well as enabling those who need to return, such as homeless families and care leavers whom the authority have housed outside their district, and those who need support to rehabilitate and integrate back into the community . . .

21. These examples are not intended to be exhaustive and housing authorities may wish to consider providing for other appropriate exceptions in the light of local circumstances. In addition, authorities retain a discretion to deal with individual cases where there are exceptional circumstances.’

\(^1\) Supplementary English Code (DCLG, December 2013), reproduced at Appendix 1 to this book, p 6.

4.252 Departure from this guidance was, however, sanctioned by the court in the case of R (Hillsden) v Epping Forest District Council\(^1\). The local housing authority in this case had adopted a residency test to identify those qualifying for housing allocation in its district. The allocation scheme set out the residency rules and specific exceptions to them but did not include any discretion for specific exceptional cases. An applicant unable to meet the terms of the allocation scheme’s residency test contended that her circumstances were exceptional and sought a judicial review\(^2\). The Administrative Court held that nothing in HA 1996, Pt 6, as amended by the Localism Act 2011, required a local housing authority to retain an override facility for individual, exceptional cases to be treated as falling within carefully drawn qualifying classes the specific conditions of which they could not satisfy. The encouragement in the Codes to include such a facility was simply that, ie ‘encouragement’.

\(^2\) R (Hillsden) v Epping Forest District Council [2015] EWHC 98 (Admin), Admin Ct.

4.253 However, this is contrary to other decisions where a residual discretion has been viewed as essential. For example, in a case decided in 2002, when the law allowed for the exclusion of classes from a housing register, a local housing authority had adopted a new fixed rule that an applicant who was a tenant of other social housing accommodation and was aged under 60 could not join the local housing register\(^1\). A housing association tenant aged only 36 applied to join the register and was refused. The judge said: ‘I am clear that it would be unlawful for the defendants to apply their new policy in such a way as to preclude their acceptance of an application which fell foul of it but of which the circumstances were exceptional’ and held that: ‘the policy is lawful, provided that the defendants never forget that indeed it is but policy which, of its nature, must never be so applied as to preclude acceptance in exceptional circumstances of an application which falls foul of it. Similarly, in R (Osei) v Newham London Borough Council the local allocation scheme enabled the housing authority to take into account former tenant arrears as an aspect of ‘behaviour’ when prioritising between applicants who would otherwise qualify for urgent rehousing on domestic violence or other emergency grounds. The court held that such a provision would not be unlawful provided it was applied with a flexibility which allowed for the personal circumstances of an applicant which might justify not taking into account that past behaviour in a particular case.

4.254 In another case, a rule in an allocation scheme suspended all applicants from bidding where they owed in excess of one week’s rent arrears, save where the Director of Housing considered there were exceptional circumstances. No-one suggested that the presence of such discretion rendered the scheme unlawful and an appeal court judge said:

‘The scheme contains the necessary safety valve to enable those who are in arrears to explain to the Director of Housing that there is some good reason for them being in arrears, for example because they are ill in hospital or whatever. In those circumstances the Director of Housing can then allow bidding to take place “in exceptional circumstances” . . . ’

4.255 In R (XC) v Southwark London Borough Council an allocation scheme which discriminated against women and people with disabilities was found to be lawful because the measure was the least intrusive possible to achieve a legitimate aim and struck the right balance. The judge was reinforced in this view ‘by the existence within the scheme of provision for exceptional cases’ through which ‘the Council has, very properly, reserved to itself the right to remedy particular incidents of unfairness thrown up by the operation of the scheme’. However, the occupier’s appeal was still dismissed. The court considered that, ‘viewed as a whole’, Hillingdon’s scheme was lawful.

1. [2017] EWHC 736 (Admin), [2017] HLR 24, Admin Ct. At the time of writing there was an outstanding application for permission to appeal against this decision.
2. [2017] EWHC 736 (Admin), [2017] HLR 24, Admin Ct at [100].
4.256 Allocation Schemes

‘arguably’ contained ‘a form of residual discretion to address exceptional cases’. In any event, even if that discretion was too narrow, or even if the respondent had failed to consider applying it, the appellant’s case must fail:

His case for allocation of this house, however much it may generate human sympathy, simply came nowhere near that degree of exceptionality that gave him a real rather than fanciful prospect of success under a residual discretion, however widely framed, as to allocation of public housing.

3 [2016] EWCA Civ 1052, [2017] HLR 3, CA at [27].
5 [2016] EWCA Civ 1052, [2017] HLR 3, CA at [31].

4.257 Moreover, the LGSCO – in guidance issued post-Hillsden – has indicated that it expects exceptional cases to be individually considered as a matter of good administration. Its guidance states that ‘We take the view that, whether or not a council has included an exceptional circumstances provision in its policy, if an applicant’s exceptional circumstances have not been considered, we are likely to find it to be at fault’. Where a discretion does exist, it must be exercised (or not exercised) lawfully: in one case, a local housing authority’s failure to exercise its discretionary power was irrational in light of social services’ assessment that the property was a risk to the children’s health and safety.

CHALLENGES TO ALLOCATION SCHEMES

4.258 Ordinarily, an applicant will only be concerned with whether his or her particular application has been correctly considered under the terms of the relevant local housing allocation scheme - in other words, whether decisions have been correctly made on questions of eligibility and qualification and whether the application has been attributed to the right band (in a banding scheme) or accorded the appropriate points (in a points-based scheme). Disputes about these and other case-specific matters can be dealt with by reviews, complaints and litigation.

1 See 2.86–2.120 for general information about reviews, complaints and judicial review litigation and 3.204–3.207 for challenges to decisions about eligibility and qualification.

4.259 But, not infrequently, a particular applicant’s case may demonstrate that there is – at least arguably – something wrong with the local allocation scheme more generally. In those circumstances the applicant may need to challenge the legality of the scheme or some part of it. That is normally done by proceedings for judicial review.

1 For a fuller description of judicial review principles and procedures, see 19.306 et seq.

4.260 For example, it might be suggested that:
the scheme has failed to comply with some express statutory requirement of HA 1996, Pt 6;
it has been adopted or varied without the requisite prior consultation;
it fails to set out the local housing authority’s policies on priority or procedures for allocation;
it has been drafted without regard to the statutory Codes of Guidance – or is contrary to them (without explanation);
the scheme is discriminatory in an unlawful respect; or the scheme does not comply with Children Act 2004, s 11.

1 See 4.5 and 4.13.
3 HA 1996, s 169(1).

4.261 In short, a housing allocation scheme adopted by a local housing authority must ‘be lawfully and fairly operated, for example without unlawful discrimination’.

at [14].

4.262 Very exceptionally, it may be said that the whole or part of a scheme is irrational in the sense that no reasonable local housing authority could have framed its scheme in that way. Between 1996 and 2008, several schemes adopted under HA 1996, Pt 6, were described in those terms by the courts.
But, in 2009, the House of Lords emphasised just how difficult it would be to sustain such a criticism, given the very broad terms in which the statute is now framed since the amendments made to HA 1996, Pt 6, by the Homelessness Act 2002. As Lord Neuberger put it:

‘once a housing allocation scheme complies with the requirements of section 167 and any other statutory requirements, the courts should be very slow to interfere on the ground of alleged irrationality.’

1 Now s 166A (England) and s 167 (Wales).

4.263 Indeed, the judicially approved examples of schemes that might be irrational are extreme:

‘one possibility might be a policy which ensured that small families had priority over large ones, or that people coming from outside the borough had priority over those living within it, or that people who had been waiting the shortest time had preference over those waiting the longest.’

4.264 Where, in such a very exceptional case, a scheme or part of a scheme is described as ‘irrational’, the relevant court will probably do no more than declare that to be the position and leave it to the local housing authority to work out how to revise or amend the scheme to address the particular problem:
4.264 Allocation Schemes

‘Castigating a scheme as irrational is of little help to anyone unless a rational alternative can be suggested. Sometimes it may be possible to do this. But where the question is one of overall policy, as opposed to individual entitlement, it is very unlikely that judges will have the tools available to make the choices which Parliament has required a housing authority to make.’

4.265 However, shortly after setting out the high hurdle that would need to be surmounted to establish that an allocation scheme was in whole or in part irrational, the House of Lords itself declared unlawful an irrational provision in the allocation scheme adopted by the largest housing authority in England.

In that case, the allocation scheme gave greater priority to a person owed a homelessness duty if they had been provided with suitable temporary accommodation than if they had remained in the unsuitable accommodation in which conditions were so bad that they were accepted as being ‘homeless’. The Court of Appeal decided that the scheme was, in that respect, unlawful. On a further appeal, the House of Lords held that:

‘The council’s explanation for this priority is to “assert the premise on which the Allocation Policy is based [namely] that those in greatest need are dealt with first”. This bald statement is not enough to justify the priority accorded to those in new temporary accommodation over those left temporarily in their existing accommodation. Both groups are in accommodation which is temporary. Indeed, at least on the face of it, if anything, it would appear that the latter group would have the more pressing claim. They are, ex hypothesi, in accommodation which has been found to be such that it would not be reasonable for them to continue in occupation. No such finding will necessarily have been made as to the accommodation now occupied by the former group. It may be that the council could have shown that, as a matter of fact, applicants in the former group are normally in worse accommodation than those in the latter group: if so, the priority would be justifiable. It may be, for example, that when the council refer to “temporary accommodation” they are referring to bed and breakfast hotels or hostels. But no such evidence, not even an opinion to that effect, has been put forward in the evidence. Accordingly, on this, relatively narrow aspect, we would agree with the decision of the Court of Appeal.’

4.266 Following this warning from the House of Lords that allocation schemes should not readily be held unlawful, subsequent rationality challenges have manifested a judicial approach of reluctance to intervene. For example:

• It was argued that an allocation scheme was unlawful because it contained an auto-bid facility for homeless applicants who had not successfully bid during a fixed period of two months. Dismissing the claim, the judge held that:

‘It is trite law that the court should be very slow to second-guess the judgments made by [local housing authorities] in the formulation of policies for the allocation of social housing: see, most authoritatively, R (Ahmad) v London Borough of Newham . . . per Lady Hale at para. 22. I am not prepared to say that the Council’s judgment that a two-month bidding period gave persons in the Claimants’ position an opportunity to exercise a reasonable degree of choice failed to conform to the requirements of the Code or was otherwise irrational.1

• A scheme for allocating pitches on official local authority Gypsy and Traveller sites was not irrational, applying the Ahmad approach, even though it gave priority to applicants with a local connection and required them to renew applications annually.2

• An allocation scheme which automatically suspended applicants with rent arrears of more than a threshold amount was not irrational. It enabled applicants in exceptional circumstances to obtain a lifting of the suspension.3

• In a scheme adopted by Redbridge London Borough Council which prioritised by combined band and application date, it was not irrational to bring forward an applicant's date when he or she moved to a different priority band. The judge said:

'It is first to be noted that Redbridge has put forward several reasons [for] the particular policy that operates to bring forward an effective date when property requirements alter. It is not for the court to assess these reasons since, to do so, it would have to examine all relevant aspects of the Scheme before reaching a conclusion as to whether the overall Scheme was rational or not. This policy also excludes any exercise of a residual discretion to modify the details of the selection scheme. It is clear from Ahmad that it is both rational and fair to exclude any residual discretion from being exercised when allocations are known. The court should not second guess the policy decisions taken by a local authority in settling the details of how it will allocate properties within a particular banding.4

4.267 These cases demonstrate how difficult it would now be to successfully contend that an allocation scheme was unlawful because it was irrational. A challenge is only likely to succeed if the irrationality is ‘obvious’. For example, in one case concerning the allocation of pitches on a local authority Gypsy Traveller site, permission to bring a challenge by way of judicial review would have been granted if the local housing authority had applied a rule that pitches would only be granted to those considered compatible with others already on site.1

5.1 Successfully establishing eligibility and/or qualification for allocation of social housing and securing consideration under a local housing authority’s housing allocation scheme are only the first stages in obtaining a rented home from a social landlord. What the applicant will usually want from his or her application is an early opportunity to consider an actual offer of a tenancy of a house or flat.

5.2 Most social landlords experience a regular turnover in their housing stock and need to make rapid and effective arrangements to re-let properties falling vacant (or to fill newly constructed or acquired property available for first letting), not least because rapid re-letting maximises rental receipts. For local housing authorities, the question will be whether to re-let pursuant to an ‘allocation’ within the terms of the allocation scheme established under the Housing Act 1996, Pt 6 (HA 1996), or whether to grant a tenancy which does not constitute an allocation, in which case the letting can be made free of the legal constraints of its ordinary allocation scheme. For private registered providers or registered social landlords (such as housing associations), the question will be whether to make the property available for nomination of a tenant by the local housing authority (which would then count as an ‘allocation’ by that local housing authority), or whether to keep it as part of their own pool of properties for re-letting to their existing tenants or to those making applications directly to them.

1 Statutory guidance on allocation schemes made under HA 1996, Pt 6 is given in Allocation of Accommodation: Guidance for local housing authorities in England (Department for Communities and Local Government (DCLG), June 2012) (the English Code), Providing social housing for local people (DCLG, December 2013) (the Supplementary English Code), Right to Move: Statutory Guidance on Social Housing Allocations for Local Housing Authorities in England (DCLG, March 2015) and in Code of Guidance for local authorities on the

2 See 1.23–1.27 for a review of the circumstances in which a person may become a tenant of social housing without that process constituting an allocation.

3 For a discussion of lettings by private registered providers or registered social landlords see Chapter 6.

5.3 If a property, whether owned by a local housing authority or another social landlord, is to be re-let in circumstances which do count as an ‘allocation’, that will trigger the operation of the local allocation scheme arrangements described in this book. To whom, and when, an actual offer of that accommodation will be made depends entirely on the detailed operation of the particular local allocation scheme. Beyond the requirements of the scheme, a local housing authority’s only duty – when selecting a tenant – is to lawfully exercise its general discretion as to the management of its own housing stock. The allocation scheme is, however, only a process of selection or sifting among potential candidates for a tenancy, or nomination for a tenancy. Following the selection or nomination, the actual offer and acceptance of the tenancy agreement (or ‘grant’ of a tenancy) is separate from the process of allocation and will take place after that process has completed. The offer and acceptance of any tenancy will be dictated by rules of contract and by any relevant statutory or regulatory controls on the ability of the local housing authority, private registered provider or registered social landlord to let property.

1 Housing Act 1985, s 21 (see R v Canterbury City Council ex p Gillespie (1987) 19 HLR 7, QBD). There is no general ‘duty of care’ owed by a local housing authority arising from the management of its housing allocation scheme: Darby v Richmond Upon Thames London Borough Council (2015) EWHC 909 (QB), [2015] Jane Legal Action p 45, QBD. An appeal against this decision was dismissed: [2017] EWCA Civ 252.

3 For example, the powers of local housing authorities to let or otherwise dispose of the housing they own are controlled by Housing Act 1985, Pt 2.

5.4 Essentially, in a true ‘allocation’ situation, prospective candidates for any available property will be identified through one of two routes:

(1) by self-selection, in the sense that candidates for the tenancy will put themselves forward or ‘bid’ for the property in a choice-based letting scheme; or

(2) by the local housing authority itself selecting a prospective tenant from among the applicants who fall to be considered under its allocation scheme (commonly known as ‘direct offers’).

5.5 Which route is available will depend upon whether and to what extent the particular local housing authority has adopted a choice-based letting element in its allocation scheme. Because a previous UK Government’s target – that every local housing authority in England should be operating some form of choice-based letting scheme – was largely achieved, this chapter first considers those choice-based arrangements. The second part of the chapter covers the alternative, ie selection made by the local housing authority. Finally, this chapter reviews more general points affecting offers and refusals of tenancies under both routes.
CHOICE-BASED LETTINGS

The policy background

5.6 In 2000, the then Labour Government issued Green and White Papers on Housing Policy, both entitled Quality and Choice: A Decent Home for All. Those Papers emphasised that applicant ‘choice’ would be a feature of the new allocation regime to be brought in by what became the Homelessness Act 2002. The rationale behind introducing customer choice into housing allocation was to reduce the number of offers of accommodation that were rejected by applicants. If applicants selected their own property, rather than being offered a property selected by the local housing authority, there were likely to be far fewer refusals. With the same aim in view, applicants were encouraged to provide as much information as possible on the type and location of accommodation that they would accept, in advance of being offered a property.

Pilot choice-based lettings schemes

5.7 In 2001, the UK Government funded 27 local housing authorities to conduct pilot schemes to test the scope for choice-based lettings. The pilots ended in March 2003, and the evaluation reports were published. The 27 English local housing authorities that participated in the pilot scheme between April 2001 and March 2003 were, on the whole, positive about the experience. Choice-based letting was considered, both by local housing authorities and by the applicants, to be more transparent and the system itself more open and simpler to understand. The system required greater participation from applicants than previously, in that they were expected to monitor advertised properties and bid themselves but generally, applicants seemed to consider that the benefits were worth the extra effort. There was an overall reduction in the rate of refusal of offers. Local housing authorities found that there were fewer households with difficulties than they had expected.

5.8 It was, however, noticeable, and concerning, that homeless households seemed to bid less frequently than other households. Whether this was because those households were more vulnerable and had more difficulty in accessing or understanding the system, or because they were less anxious to move from their temporary accommodation than existing tenants waiting for transfers, was unclear.

5.9 The pilot schemes included areas of high and low demand for social housing. However, in none of those areas, even those of low demand, was a truly ‘choice-based’ lettings scheme implemented, nor could it be. All of the schemes had a mechanism for prioritising candidate households who were...
5.9 Being Allocated a Property

entitled to reasonable preference under HA 1996, Pt 6 (and, in particular, for prioritising homeless households), as a failure to do so would have been unlawful.

5.10 In 2005, Shelter published a separate evaluation of the pilot schemes, based on direct contact with eight local housing authorities, information publicly available from others, and the experiences of their own housing advisers and clients. Shelter confirmed that choice-based letting was perceived by both applicants and local housing authority staff as fairer and more transparent, the process was quicker and there were fewer refusals than under previous schemes. However, Shelter also discovered ‘a disturbing pattern’ that homeless applicants were given less choice, and were compelled to bid more often or more quickly for properties than other applicants, resulting in an increasing concentration of previously homeless households in low-demand areas. It was also concerned that most local housing authorities had not allocated extra resources to help vulnerable applicants with the bidding process. Shelter concluded by identifying the difficulties of providing choice, given the lack of social housing available, and warning:

‘choice is a hollow concept when there is a chronic housing shortage . . . given the current lack of available social housing, choice-based letting cannot realise its full potential.’

1 A Question of Choice: Good Practice and Issues in Choice-Based Letting (Shelter, June 2005).
2 Principally through the use of time-limited priority cards; see 5.31.

5.11 Based upon the perceived successes of the pilot scheme, and the general policy shift towards ‘choice’ in the provision of public services, in 2005 the then UK Government set a target in its 5-year plan1 that 25% of local housing authorities should adopt some form of choice-based letting scheme by the end of 2005 and that all local housing authorities should be offering choice to applicants by 20102. Considerable progress was made towards that target. By April 2011, 87% of local housing authorities in England (283 of 326 local housing authorities) participated in choice-based lettings, an increase from 80% in 1 April 20103, although there were wide regional variations4.

3 A useful overview of how choice-based lettings schemes worked, and of government policies and targets for their implementation, is given in ‘Choice-Based Lettings: A Factsheet’ (ODPM, March 2005).

Evaluation of choice-based lettings schemes

5.12 A major study of 13 schemes, which had each been operating for over 18 months, was published in October 20065. It found that:
Choice-based lettings 5.15

- the significance of ‘waiting time’ as a factor in allocation had increased compared to pre-choice arrangements;
- the vast majority of lettings continued to go to high need applicants;
- many applicants saw bidding as a positive proactive way of looking for a home, but some who had been bidding unsuccessfully over long periods expressed frustration with the systems and lack of confidence in their fairness;
- while most applicants understood the bidding system, many reported having less understanding of the rules by which bidders were ranked²;
- the schemes appeared to have improved rather than damaged the prospects of statutory homeless households;
- in most cases, there had been improvement in tenancy sustainment (measured by the proportion of tenancies lasting more than 12 months); and
- the additional costs of the schemes were more than offset by tenancy management savings (in faster re-lets and lower turnover).

1 Monitoring the Longer Term Impact of Choice-Based Lettings (CLG, October 2006) summarised in Housing Research Summary No 231 (CLG, 2006).

5.13 In 2008, the Department of Health (DH) commissioned and published research on the experiences of disabled individuals in accessing choice-based letting schemes¹ and associated guides for social landlords establishing such schemes² and for people with learning difficulties who try to use them³.

1 Choice Based Lettings and People with Learning Disabilities (DH, February 2008).
3 Choice Based Lettings: A Guide to Choosing a Home Through the Council (DH, February 2008).

5.14 A concern with choice-based letting has been the impact on members of black and minority ethnic (BME) communities in areas where choice-based letting has been introduced. Unpublished research for the Federation of Black Housing Organisations in 2004 showed that the proportion of BME tenants responding to suitable advertised properties was small¹. One study showed that black and ethnic minorities, and especially those using choice-based letting schemes, were the most likely to end up in deprived neighbourhoods².

5.15 The move to choice-based letting was given a significant push in the summer of 2008 by the publication of Allocation of Accommodation: Choice-based Lettings¹ – a code of statutory guidance issued by the Secretary of State to local housing authorities in England under the powers given by HA 1996, s 169. That now-repealed Code, and the earlier statutory guidance issued to English local housing authorities, had advised that the UK Government believed that choice should be provided in housing allocation wherever possible.

1 DCLG, 2008.

5.16 In 2007, the Welsh Government published its report on Welsh social landlords’ approaches to choice in letting accommodation. The report identified some 11 choice-based schemes which covered the whole of a social landlord’s available stock1. The report describes the key features of those schemes, recording a shift away from ‘time waiting’ to ‘housing need’ as the main means of prioritising among applicants. It found that the weakest general feature of the schemes was the late provision of feedback on bid outcomes and patchy content of that feedback. The report’s recommendations were non-prescriptive as to the type of scheme a local housing authority in Wales should adopt.

5.17 The 2010–15 UK Coalition Government took a less enthusiastic approach to choice-based letting than its predecessors. As a result, the current Codes of Guidance contain no steer towards choice-based letting, or any other particular mechanism for allocation, preferring to leave the matter entirely to the decision of the local housing authority1.

1 See, for example, Welsh Code, para 3.48.

5.18 The only material that the 2010–15 UK Coalition Government published on choice-based letting was two research reports1 commissioned by the previous government. Those local housing authorities that have already adopted, or are minded to adopt, a choice-based letting element in their local allocation schemes may find the two reports useful as they focus on an aspect of choice-based lettings previously under-explored, ie their effects on ‘accessible housing registers’2.

2 An accessible housing register is ‘a list of suitable homes for disabled people with access needs’: Disability Equality Report by the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (DCLG, 2008), p 28. See further on ‘accessible housing registers’: the Welsh Code at paras 3.99–3.104 and 4.5–4.11.

5.19 The Welsh government has taken a similarly non-prescriptive approach. The Welsh Code does not recommend any one system of allocation and encourages local housing authorities to determine housing need in, and strategic priorities for, their own areas, after consultation1. It briefly mentions three different approaches – choice-based lettings, mid-way schemes, and hybrid schemes – but offers no further elaboration of them2. It simply emphasises that any scheme will, in reality, include both an element of choice and also an attempt to meet need. The difference between the three approaches lies in the balance that each attempts to strike between choice and need. In general, the Welsh Code suggests that maintaining common housing lists, rather than separate lists for different groups of applicants, encouraging mobility between different areas and different types of tenure, providing good quality information, making the widest practicable range of options available to applicants and, above all, operating a simple and transparent system, should be hallmarks of an allocation scheme.\footnote{Welsh Code, paras 1.4 and 3.5.}

\subsection*{Choice-based lettings 5.24}

The statutory basis for choice-based lettings

5.20 Despite all the emphasis on ‘choice’, at least in policy terms, during the decade 2000–10, there is not now – and never has been – any statutory obligation on local housing authorities to implement choice-based letting schemes. HA 1996, Pt 6, merely provides that applicants should be informed of any local policy on offering either:

(1) ‘a choice of housing accommodation’; or
(2) ‘the opportunity to express preferences’ about what is to be allocated to them.\footnote{HA 1996, s 166A(2) (England), s 167(1A) (Wales).}

5.21 In either case that need only be by way of a statement in the local housing allocation scheme. There is no requirement to notify every individual applicant of the opportunities for choice or for expressing preferences in local housing allocation arrangements.

5.22 Strictly speaking, this obligation to deal with choice and preferences in the local housing allocation scheme could be met by a simple statement in the allocation scheme to the effect that there is no local policy on ‘choice’ or customer ‘preferences’. At a minimum, however, local housing authorities could be expected to allow applicants an opportunity to express a preference for accommodation of a particular type or in a particular location.

5.23 There is no statutory duty positively to give effect to applicant choice or preference in HA 1996, Pt 6. The position in relation to allocations is no different to that in respect of the statutory duty to provide temporary accommodation for the homeless, ie unless the local scheme expressly provides to the contrary, an applicant is not entitled to any choice.\footnote{R (Khatun) v Newham London Borough Council [2004] EWCA Civ 55, (2004) 36 HLR 29, CA.}

5.24 In summary, therefore, HA 1996, Pt 6, simply permits, but does not require, local housing authorities to contain within their allocation schemes any provisions allowing applicants opportunities to state preferences or make choices. For those local housing authorities wishing to adopt choice-based letting, HA 1996, Pt 6, expressly enables local allocation schemes to include provision for the allocation of particular units of accommodation in response to specific applications for that accommodation. This is the sole statutory basis for local housing authorities to implement ‘choice’ by means of enabling applicants to ‘bid’ for specific properties.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(6) (England) and s 167(2E) (Wales), discussed further at 4.165–4.171.

5.25 In this absence of any legislative compulsion, the direction of travel towards choice-based letting is a matter for local policy choices on methods of housing allocation. All the statutory guidance previously issued in England – which positively promoted choice – has been withdrawn1 and the Welsh Code does not recommend any one system of allocation.

5.26 Indeed, one recent report suggested that some local housing authorities have abandoned choice-based lettings in favour of direct allocations. This is frequently done with the intention of saving costs but there is doubt as to whether it does indeed save money, given the consequential increased expense of dealing with challenges to direct lettings1.

1 Building Bridges: A guide to better partnership working between local authorities and housing association, published by the Chartered Institute of Housing in association with the Association of Retained Council Housing and VIVID Housing, September 2017, p 97.

The practicalities of a choice-based scheme

5.27 Those local housing authorities that have adopted the choice-based letting route have generally arranged for their available properties to be advertised on their websites or in magazines or by emails or texts sent to those eligible to ‘bid’ for them.

5.28 Such local housing authorities have needed to identify mechanisms for ranking those who bid for advertised properties and most have adopted allocation schemes which attribute to applicants a relative rank or priority as against other prospective bidders. Broadly, either of two alternative systems will be in operation:

(1) a ‘banding’ system, so that applicants are placed in different bands reflecting their different needs, and, within those bands, applicants are prioritised according to the length of time they have waited; or
(2) a ‘points-based’ system simply giving those applicants with the most urgent housing needs priority over others with less urgent needs by affording them more points1.

1 Whether by a simplified points system or by ‘time limited priority cards’ which would enable an applicant with the most urgent need to have priority over other applicants for a specified period.
5.29 Both types of scheme can take account of the length of time an applicant has been waiting for an allocation under the local housing allocation scheme. In the banding schemes, waiting time can be used as a factor to fix relative priority for those applicants within the same band. In points-based schemes, waiting time can be recognised by the award of additional points for specific periods spent waiting. One survey found that the adoption of choice-based letting tended to put a greater focus on the relative waiting times among applicants:

‘Waiting time made some contribution to applicant priority in most authorities. As perceived by survey respondents, however, its significance tended to be much greater under CBL than under traditional allocations schemes. Whereas 19 of the 20 CBL authorities considered waiting time to be “quite significant” or “very significant” here, this was true for only seven of the other 32 authorities.’

5.30 Where available properties are openly advertised, so that applicants can apply for particular properties, the advertising will usually state the level of priority and/or the waiting time required by the likely successful applicant. The thinking is that providing this information will allow applicants to assess their chances of success, and so to refrain from bidding if they would have no prospect of being allocated the accommodation.

5.31 Some local housing authorities in England have allocation schemes under which ‘choice’ (ie freedom to bid) is only available to certain classes of applicants, most often homeless households, for limited periods. When the period expires, the local housing authority reverts to the officer-led form of allocation described later in this chapter (sometimes called ‘direct lettings’). Shelter’s evaluation of the pilot choice-based lettings schemes in England, published in June 2005, was highly critical of time-limited choice for those in greatest need, arguing that the effect was to put pressure on those applicants to bid for unpopular properties. Shelter also identified at least two local housing authorities that refused to accept bids from homeless applicants for high-demand properties. Shelter recommended that, if time-limited priority cards were to be used, they should be valid for a long enough period of time (at least six months) to allow for a suitable range of properties to become available, and that the applicant’s needs should be reviewed at the end of the period.

1 See 5.48–5.52.
2 A Question of Choice: Good Practice and Issues in Choice-Based Letting (Shelter, June 2005). See also 5.10.

5.32 In one case, a local housing authority’s allocation scheme enabled homeless applicants to bid freely alongside other applicants for social housing for two months before the system would auto-bid for the next available property sufficient for their needs. A challenge to the lawfulness of that arrangement failed. The judge said that he was ‘not prepared to say that the Council’s judgment that a two-month bidding period gave persons in the claimants’ position an opportunity to exercise a reasonable degree of choice failed to conform to the requirements of the Code or was otherwise irratio-

The courts’ approach

5.33 In the first decade of operation of HA 1996, Pt 6, the courts discerned the meeting of housing ‘need’ as the primary policy driver in the legislation1. The central problem identified by the litigation in this period was how to establish a system that was easy to operate and understand, that gave priority to customer choice, but that also took account of the vast range of needs exhibited by applicants and ranked them in a way which gave effect to the perceived statutory purpose that those in the greatest need should be housed first. The courts had a number of opportunities to consider these issues.

1 Notwithstanding later developments in the case law, the UK Government’s policy is still one of ‘ensuring that priority for social housing goes to those in the greatest need’: English Code, para 2.1.

5.34 An early attempt to implement a choice-based lettings scheme, reconciling freedom of choice with providing reasonable preference to those groups falling within the statutory categories by the adoption of broad priority bands, was made by the London Borough of Lambeth1. The Court of Appeal considered that attempt in the linked cases of R (A) v Lambeth London Borough Council and R (Lindsay) v Lambeth London Borough Council2 and concluded that Lambeth had been unsuccessful and had failed to give effect to the statutory scheme properly. Lambeth’s bands, recognising different categories of needs, were organised in such a way that applicants who did not fall within any of the reasonable preference categories could have the same priority as those who did. The Court of Appeal also criticised Lambeth’s policy of allowing applicants to define their own needs, by specifying the size and location of accommodation they sought (and being encouraged to do so as widely and flexibly as possible), as haphazard and not capable of ensuring that the categories of applicants falling within the statutory ‘reasonable preference’ groups were given preference. The court expressed concern that applicants might under-estimate their own needs, in order to stand a greater chance of being allocated accommodation, but that some applicants, such as families with young children, would have fewer chances of being allocated accommodation as they would not find it possible to under-estimate their needs. In reality, the main ‘choice’ offered by the Lambeth scheme was a freedom to opt for poorer quality or less satisfactory accommodation in the hope of an earlier offer. Having been declared unlawful in July 2002, it was replaced by a new allocation scheme in February 2004.

5.35 In the London Borough of Newham, where a choice-based scheme had been operating (with amendments) since September 2002, at least two early judicial review applications were launched. The first resulted in an undertaking to amend the scheme in June 2003. The second was again settled on terms that the local housing authority would further amend its allocation scheme. Some of those amendments were later revoked by the local housing authority’s Director of Housing, and others were incorporated into a scheme that reached its seventh revision before being upheld as lawful.

2. R (Heather Phillip) v Newham London Borough Council CO/1731/2004 (unreported) 22 June 2004. See also ‘Choice Scheme Revised After Challenge’ (2004) Inside Housing, 30 July, p 71. In R (Najha Al-Juboori) v Ealing London Borough Council [2002] EWHC 2726 (Admin) permission had been granted for a challenge to the local choice-based allocation scheme in a judicial review claim. The trial was adjourned to enable other local housing authorities in London to join the proceedings. By the time it was restored, the claimant had been re-housed and the scheme amended so that no judgment on the merits of the claim was delivered.

3. See 5.38–5.41.

5.36 In R (Cali) v Waltham Forest London Borough Council, a choice-based scheme containing a banding system was declared to be unlawful because it did not provide for the identification of a household’s cumulative needs and so could not effectively offer additional preference. Nor did it identify, within the published scheme, the criteria by which an applicant qualified for reasonable preference.

2. See 4.39.

5.37 In R (Lin & Hassan) v Barnet London Borough Council, a points-based scheme of choice-based letting was held to be unlawful as its provision giving 100 points to its existing tenants, seeking transfers, artificially raised the points threshold (above which a bid might succeed) to the detriment of applicants who were not existing tenants and who were entitled to a statutory preference. That decision was not disturbed on an appeal pursued (for the most part unsuccessfully) by the claimants, who sought to establish that the choice-based scheme gave insufficient opportunity to the homeless to secure long-term housing.

5.38 The legal landscape changed dramatically in March 2009 with the first House of Lords decision on a choice-based letting scheme. Newham had adopted a banding scheme with three bands:

1. applicants in reasonable preference categories;
2. transfer cases with no reasonable preference; and
3. non-transfer applicants with no reasonable preferences.

2. In common with the schemes of many other authorities, Newham’s allocation scheme included a ‘top slice’ facility enabling a very small number of those in the most acute housing need to obtain a priority higher than the main bandings. Subsequently published research has shown...
5.38 Being Allocated a Property

that across local housing authorities which assess housing ‘need’ among applicants, the proportion of the ‘top banded’ applicants was in most cases under 3% of all applicants: Exploring Local Authority Policy and Practice on Housing Allocations (CLG, July 2009), para 10.

5.39 Unsurprisingly, the vast majority of advertised properties went to bidders from the first band. But within that band applicants were afforded relative priority as between one another, not by reference to housing need (in the sense of particular assessments of cumulative or composite need), but by date order. The applicant waiting longest among the highest banded bidders for a particular property would be allocated it. In both the High Court and Court of Appeal the scheme was held to be unlawful.

5.40 The House of Lords allowed the local housing authority’s appeal. It decided that nothing in HA 1996, Pt 6, as amended by the Homelessness Act 2002, required allocation to those in the greatest need, nor required a facility for cumulative or composite assessment of needs. A local housing authority such as Newham, where demand vastly outstripped supply, was entitled to adopt a simple banding scheme which met the statutory obligation to give a reasonable preference to the statutory categories but then prioritised amongst them by waiting time.

5.41 This dramatic change in the judicial perception of HA 1996, Pt 6 (as amended), gave new impetus to simplified choice-based banding schemes. For the reasons explained in Chapter 4, many fewer legal challenges to allocation schemes can now be expected.

1 See 4.262–4.267.

5.42 While the current English Code certainly promotes the use of these flexibilities it offers no guidance on ‘banding’, ‘points’ or ‘choice’. The Chartered Institute of Housing (CIH) has suggested that the whole emphasis in the Code, on a more managed approach to waiting lists, ‘may present challenges to local housing authorities also intending to keep a choice-based letting scheme’. Those local housing authorities deciding to retain an element of choice, whilst also seeking to address housing need, might find the extended guidance available from the CIH of more assistance than the current English Code.

2 Allocations & Local Flexibility (CIH, March 2010).

The effectiveness of choice

5.43 Despite the use of the name ‘choice-based letting’ to describe the process, the ultimate allocation of any particular property by a local housing authority will lie with the local housing authority itself. Many individuals may have expressed their wish (usually through a ‘bid’) to be allocated a particular property advertised as vacant – it will then be for the local housing authority to select one household from among them (or none of them)\(^1\). Of course, the terms of the local allocation scheme may, and should, spell out precisely how the choice is to be made between them, and by whom. For example, the scheme might specify that the property is to be offered to the candidate with the highest banding, longest waiting time, greatest number of points, or whatever\(^2\). The scheme may also specify who is to be considered next, if the highest bidder pulls out.

\(^1\) Or, where the property is owned by a private registered provider, registered social landlord or a different local housing authority, to decide which applicant(s) to nominate to that landlord.

\(^2\) For example, in R (van Boolen) v Barking and Dagenham London Borough Council [2009] EWHC 2196 (Admin), (2009) September Legal Action, p 34, Admin Ct, the policy of the local housing authority was to identify the bidders in the highest band and then to give further preference as between them to those applicants with a local connection.

5.44 In this sense, ‘choice-based letting’ is a misnomer. Almost all the schemes adopted by local housing authorities are, in reality, choice-based applications schemes. They simply facilitate the expression of interest by bidders in particular properties available for letting. It does not necessarily follow that the highest ranked bidder at the closing date will be allocated the property. For example, most schemes incorporate an element of re-assessment of shortlisted bidders to ensure that they are still eligible or qualified and have maintained their initially awarded degree of priority. That element of re-checking (or evaluating the bids) is not at uncommon and many schemes retain some form of override enabling the rejection of bids from applicants who are considered, by officers, to be unsuitable for the particular property. These practices are all perfectly lawful, provided they are spelt out in the published allocation scheme.

5.45 In many avowedly ‘choice-based’ schemes, not all the available properties are advertised. Some empty homes are often reserved for applicants entitled to or required to accept what schemes may describe as ‘direct lets’ or ‘direct offers’. In some schemes, advertised properties may be withdrawn to be offered outside the allocation scheme or to direct-let cases. In others, properties are offered subject to multiple qualifications as to the type of bid that will be considered. In yet others, bidding preferences expire if not used within a fixed period or on the refusal of offers. In some schemes, provision is made for ‘choice’ to be available only for a fixed period and thereafter for bids for appropriate properties to be automatically made on an applicant’s behalf\(^3\).

5.46 It has yet to be seen whether the courts will recognise any enforceable ‘legitimate expectation’ on the part of the candidate who would be due to receive the offer of a particular property under the strict terms of the choice-based allocation scheme\(^4\), although the Ombudsman has frequently criticised and sanctioned local housing authorities for failures which have led to applicants being wrongly prevented from bidding for a property\(^5\). Could, for example, the local housing authority withdraw a property, advertised under the choice-based scheme, and offer it to another applicant, or let it in circumstances that do not constitute an ‘allocation’ after the bid process had closed? What would be the legal effect of mistakenly overlooking the bidder with the highest priority under the scheme, and offering the property, inadvertently, to the next person in the queue of bidding candidates? It is unlikely that a simple failure of communication  would give rise to a claim of breach of ‘legitimate expectation’ but a clear departure from the published scheme may well do so.

3 In Globa v Ukraine [2012] ECHR 1375, Mr Globa had been at the top of the waiting list for a Town Council apartment. A vacant apartment was wrongly allocated to someone below him on the list. He took court proceedings and obtained a judgment that: the occupiers be evicted; he be allocated the flat; and the occupiers be rehoused. The Town Council failed to comply with the order and enforcement measures failed. The European Court of Human Rights awarded him €5,000 compensation.

5 See also 4.50–4.53.

5.47 Applicants who believe that they have not been treated appropriately under a choice-based scheme will need to obtain access to the courts very quickly if they are to prevent letting of a property for which they and others have bid. Unless an application for judicial review is launched very quickly and, if necessary, an injunction obtained to prevent the property being let, the disappointed applicant may well find that the claim has become academic or at best reduced to an attempt to prevent any future departure from the published arrangements.

LOCAL HOUSING AUTHORITY LED ALLOCATION (DIRECT LETS)

5.48 If a local housing authority is not operating a choice-based allocation scheme, all allocation decisions will be made by officers of the local housing authority applying the principles set out in the local allocation scheme. The scheme must identify the procedure for making actual allocation decisions, including the name or designation of the responsible officer(s).

1 HA 1996, s 166A(1) (England), s 167(1) (Wales).

5.49 Planning for such allocations usually starts well before a specific property becomes available to offer. Once an applicant has been accepted onto the allocation scheme, and the preference to which he or she is entitled has been assessed and accorded, the local housing authority must decide what type of property the applicant should be offered, and whether there is any particular geographic area in which an allocation would or would not be appropriate.
5.50 HA 1996, Pt 6, permits local housing authorities to target certain properties at certain groups of applicants. Building on that provision, many have established ‘local lettings’ policies and schemes within their published allocation schemes. Others have decided to make provision in their allocation schemes for a specific quota of properties to be allocated to particular groups of applicants. The English Code, for example, suggests that local housing authorities might set aside an annual quota of properties for prospective adopters and foster parents or a specified proportion of the stock for workers with skills that are in short supply locally. However, none of these arrangements must be allowed to produce an allocation scheme that fails to give an overall preference to those in the reasonable preference groups or that unlawfully discriminates against people with protected characteristics under the Equality Act 2010.

1 HA 1996, s 166A(6)(b) (England) and s 167(2E)(b) (Wales).
3 English Code, para 4.31.
4 English Code, para 4.27.
5 English Code, para 4.5. In R (H) v Ealing London Borough Council [2017] EWCA Civ 1127, [2018] HLR 2, CA, the local housing authority’s allocation scheme set aside twenty percent of lettings for ‘working households’ and ‘model tenants’. The Court of Appeal held that these provisions were indirectly discriminatory but that the judge in the Administrative Court had erred in his approach to finding that the discrimination was not justified. The question as to whether the provisions were in fact justified was not remitted as the local housing authority was reviewing its scheme. See Chapter 4 in respect of avoiding discrimination in allocation schemes.

5.51 Once a property of the requisite description in the appropriate area becomes available for letting, the local housing authority must decide from among the pool of available applicants which of them should first be offered it. This is the most sensitive aspect of allocation and the stage at which greatest transparency will be needed. Many authorities will use ‘banding’ or ‘points’ to rank the relative priority of those in the pool of available applicants. How the actual selection is made will fall to be determined by the particular local allocation scheme.

1 See 4.44–4.45.

5.52 Some local housing authorities reserve a ‘direct letting’ function for use by officers in tandem with, or as a variant of, what is otherwise a choice-based letting scheme. It is particularly common for such hybrid schemes to be adopted where applicants, who are being accommodated in temporary accommodation under the homelessness provisions of HA 1996, Pt 7, would be reluctant to bid under a choice-based scheme for less desirable properties than the temporary homes they occupy. In one case, a local allocation scheme dealt with that scenario by allowing such applicants a ‘free’ bidding opportunity for a fixed period but thereafter the scheme ‘auto-bid’ for any appropriate properties which applicants were offered if they were the highest ranked bidders. A legal challenge to that arrangement, based on the argument that it was inconsistent with the statutory guidance then in place, failed.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see Chapter 16.
5.52 Being Allocated a Property

GENERAL POINTS

The offer of accommodation

5.53 Under either of the two routes described earlier in this chapter, a particular applicant will be identified to be allocated an available property. At that stage the strict ‘allocation’ process, which involves simple selection or nomination of a candidate, comes to an end. The actual letting will normally be handled by housing management staff of the relevant social landlord (which may be the local housing authority itself) who will sign up the new tenant following the offer and acceptance of a tenancy.

5.54 Once an allocation of particular accommodation has been made, the Welsh Code advises that an applicant should be given ‘a reasonable period’ to consider whether to accept it. ‘Reasonable period’ is not defined in HA 1996, Pt 6, or the Codes. The applicant should be given sufficient time for careful consideration and the length of time provided should depend on the individual circumstances of each applicant. Vulnerable applicants, or applicants who are unfamiliar with the property, are likely to need longer. An applicant who is in hospital or who needs to arrange a support worker to be present at the viewing may also need longer, as may those who are working or have childcare commitments.

2. See these, and further examples, at Welsh Code, para 3.66.

5.55 The local housing allocation scheme may allow unlimited bids for available properties or the making of an unlimited number of offers by officers to applicants. Alternatively, the scheme may cap the number of bids or offers that may be made. There is no nationally prescribed maximum or minimum number.

5.56 Some local housing authorities have allocation schemes that discriminate among classes of applicant, enabling certain applicants to enjoy a greater number of bids or offers than others. In the past this had been particularly true in relation to households owed housing duties under the homelessness assistance provisions of HA 1996, Pt 7, who have often been restricted to limited bids or offers. However, the 2012 Welsh Code made it plain that if it was previously expected that homeless households would be discriminated against in that way, the position has changed. It stated in terms that:

‘It is no longer an expectation that homeless people should be given a single offer of accommodation. Wherever possible, they should receive the same number of offers,' or range of choices, as existing tenants or Part 6 applicants (general waiting list applicants). 1

1 2012 Welsh Code, para 4.47. There is no equivalent guidance in the English Code.

5.57 Of course, the current Codes now recognise that a single suitable offer may have the effect of releasing a local housing authority from its homelessness duties 1.

5.58 The effect of refusal of an offer on an application for social housing allocation is discussed later in this chapter 1.

1 See 5.83–5.86.

Types of tenancies to be offered

Size and location

5.59 The extent and circumstances of the applicant’s household as assessed under the allocation scheme obviously determines the number of bedrooms that the applicant may expect to find in an allocated property 1. It will be for each local housing authority to frame its own rules in its allocation scheme dealing with the size of property to be offered. The scheme should be clear as to how members of the applicant’s household will be calculated 2. Provided that the result is not the allocation of a property which would be statutorily overcrowded 3, local housing authorities are free to set their own criteria 4. Some may wish to adopt the ‘bedroom standard’ promoted by the Secretary of State in England 5. If a property is being allocated to a working-age applicant who would be under-occupying it, the local housing authority will need to be aware of the housing benefit implications 6.

1 R v Lewisham London Borough Council ex p Pinzon (1999) 2 CCLR 152, QBD. This may not be a straightforward task. In R (Bibi) v Camden London Borough Council [2004] EWHC 2527 (Admin), [2005] HLR 18, Admin Ct, the local housing authority offered a woman a one-bedroom property, overlooking the fact that she had a joint residence order in respect of her children with her former husband. It was required to reconsider the offer, taking into account that order, as well as the other demands on its housing stock and any potential under-occupancy of the property. For a discussion of ‘household’ in this context see 3.171–3.173.

2 In Complaint against Kettering Borough Council, 16 012 028, 3 August 2017, (2017) November Legal Action, p 41, the scheme was unclear as to in what circumstances adult children would be assessed as forming part of the household.

3 Complaint against York City Council, 11 018 683, 16 October 2012, (2012) December Legal Action, p 30 well illustrates the case that a local housing authority must take in determining what rooms, in the property to be allocated, actually constitute ‘bedrooms’ (or, more technically, ‘sleeping accommodation’) for the purposes of the statutory overcrowding standards.

5 See 4.84(2).

6 English Code, para 4.22.
Being Allocated a Property

5.60 An applicant, or a member of his or her household, may have a medical need for a ground floor property or an accessible bathroom, or an additional bathroom or toilet. The Codes advise that applicants who receive support from a carer, who does not live with them, should have their need for a spare bedroom taken into account wherever possible. In Wales, local housing authorities are reminded that elderly applicants who are awaiting an allocation of accommodation have particular needs. In England, local housing authorities considering applications from those proposing to foster or adopt are encouraged to balance the case for allocation of a larger property against the risk that any placement may fail to materialise or break down.

3. In R (Aqamie) v London & Quadrant Housing Trust [2016] EWHC (Admin) 2396, the court upheld a decision to refuse to consent to a mutual exchange on the grounds that the claimant would be under-occupying, despite his desire to adopt. The court agreed that the defendant was 'not obliged to grant consent by reference to the future intentions of the claimant' (at [5]).

5.61 When determining the extent and circumstances of the applicant's household, the local housing authority must take all of the members of the household into account, whether they were eligible or qualified for an allocation in their own right or not, unless the local allocation scheme otherwise provides. There is no statutory provision permitting local housing authorities to ignore the needs of members who would not have satisfied the eligibility or qualification test had they been the applicant, although the authority may take into account a family member's immigration status when deciding whether they form part of the applicant's household at all. The matter is one to be determined by the terms of the local scheme.

5.62 An applicant may need or prefer a property to be in a particular location, or there may be locations that the applicant cannot be placed in, for example, if the applicant has left an area due to violence. Alternatively, a local allocation scheme might provide that an applicant will not be made an allocation of property in a locality within the local housing authority's district in which he or she has previously been the perpetrator (or, perhaps, victim) of anti-social behaviour.

1. R (Carney) v Bolton-at-Home Ltd [2012] EWHC 2553 (Admin), (2012) November Legal Action, p 22, Admin Ct. In Complaint against Royal Borough of Windsor and Maidenhead Council 16 003 062, 15 February 2018, (2018) May Legal Action, p 37, the housing association to which the complainant had been nominated refused the nomination because the property was too close to his ex-wife.

Sole or joint tenancy?

5.63 The allocation cannot be made of a property to be held on a joint tenancy where one of the joint tenants is not eligible for an allocation. However, the tenancy could be granted as a sole tenancy to the eligible applicant in those circumstances. There is no similar difficulty if one of the applicants to a local housing authority in England is not in a qualifying class. Such a joint applicant can be included in a joint tenancy.

1. HA 1996, s 160ZA(1)(b) (England) and s 160A(1)(c) (Wales). Welsh Code, para 2.17. For eligibility, see Chapter 3.

2. English Code, para 3.29. As to ‘qualifying class’ see 3.76–3.150.

5.64 Where there are joint applicants, or a partner, friend or live-in carer is included as part of an individual applicant’s household, local housing authorities will normally offer joint tenancies so that either person would continue as tenant if the other died. To avoid any unlawful discrimination, same-sex partners should be treated in the same way as heterosexual partners. If prospective tenants ask to be granted a joint tenancy, and are refused, the local housing authority should give clear, written reasons for the refusal.

Applicants with children may prefer to take a tenancy which offers contractual rights of succession to the children because new secure and assured tenancies of social housing in England no longer carry statutory rights of succession by family members, other than partners.

2. See Rodriguez v Minister of Housing of the Government of Gibraltar [2009] UKPC 52, (2009) 28 BHRC 189, PC noted at 4.229. See also Welsh Code, para 3.23 suggesting that if a sole tenancy is initially granted to a person who later enters into a civil partnership that tenant may be ‘entitled’ to vary it into a joint tenancy with his or her new partner.

4. See the amendments made by Localism Act 2011, ss 160–161 to the succession provisions of the Housing Act 1985 and Housing Act 1988, applying to tenancies granted on or after 1 April 2012 in England. Housing and Planning Act 2016, Pr 4 and Sch 8, further amend the Housing Act 1985 to make the rules governing succession to secure tenancies granted before 1 April 2012 the same as those for tenancies granted from that date and, in addition, to stipulate that family members other than spouses, civil partners, or those living together as husband and wife, will only be given a five year fixed term tenancy where they are allowed to succeed. Housing and Planning Act 2016, Pr 4 and Sch 8 amend the Housing Act 1996 to make corresponding changes to the rules governing succession in respect of introductory and demoted tenancies. It is not known if and when these provisions will be brought into force.

5.65 An allocation of accommodation made under the local allocation scheme may produce the offer of a secure, introductory or assured tenancy. But even within those categories there may be variants as to the form of tenancy and security of tenure.

1. HA 1996, s 159(2). Note that, when the provisions of the Renting Homes (Wales) Act 2016 take effect, people who rent from housing associations will have the same rights as tenants of local housing authorities: Welsh Code, para 1.17.

5.66 It has always been possible for local housing authorities to grant secure tenancies either on a periodic or fixed term basis. However, since 1 April 2012, it has also been possible for local housing authorities in England to offer a variant of the latter, known as a ‘flexible tenancy’, which carries a mandatory right to re-possess at the end of the term. As a flexible tenancy is a form of secure tenancy, it can be offered as the result of an allocation. Part 4, Ch 6 and

Sch 7 of the Housing and Planning Act 2016 will, when enacted, phase out ‘tenancies for life’ meaning that virtually all new secure tenancies will be for fixed terms. There is at the time of writing no date yet set for when they will come into force.

5.67 Assured tenancies of social housing are only allocated through allocation schemes by way of nomination to private registered providers or registered social landlords. Assured tenancies can also be periodic or for a fixed term. An assured shorthold tenancy is a form of assured tenancy carrying a mandatory right to recovery of possession. Such assured shorthold tenancies can be offered by private registered providers or registered social landlords. In practice, if a periodic assured shorthold tenancy is offered as an allocation, it may be intended to fulfil the same function as an introductory tenancy, i.e. that it should be probationary and cease to be an assured shorthold tenancy (and thus become a fully assured tenancy) after a specified period. Alternatively, the property may be offered by the private registered provider or registered social landlord on a fixed term assured shorthold tenancy, perhaps at an ‘affordable’ rent, rather than an ordinary ‘social housing’ rent. In the statutory guidance for local housing authorities in England, the Secretary of State has indicated that he expects both local housing authorities and private registered providers to make ‘affordable rent’ homes available through the local allocation scheme, in the same way that other rented properties are made available.

2 See, for England, the regulatory guidance given by the Tenancy Standard, para 2 (Homes and Communities Agency, April 2012), part of The Regulatory Framework for Social Housing in England from April 2015 (Homes and Communities Agency, March 2015).
3 English Code, para 6.4.

5.68 For the first time, in 2012/13, social landlords were asked to record what numbers of their tenancies were granted on a fixed-term rather than periodic basis. The data collected indicated that of over 370,000 social housing lets, 12,597 were fixed-term lets of general needs social housing and there were 7,475 fixed-term lets at affordable rents. These figures indicate than less than 10% of lettings made by social landlords were on a fixed-term basis. By 2016/17 the proportion of general needs private registered provider lettings let at social rent levels on a fixed term basis had increased to 23%. The majority of general needs fixed-term tenancies (75%) were issued for between three and five years but for supported housing 83% of fixed-term tenancies were for two years or less in length.

2 See also F Priest-Stephens ‘Fixed Term Tenancies Under the Spotlight’ (2014) Inside Housing 16 June.

5.69 In England, the tenancy strategy, published by the local housing authority, will explain which forms of tenancy of social housing are likely to be available in any particular district, whether from the local housing authority or from other social landlords within that district. The local allocation scheme will have been drawn up having regard to the content of that tenancy strategy.

1 Localism Act 2011, s 150.
2 HA 1996, s 166A(12)(b).

Furnished or unfurnished?

5.70 The allocation scheme will govern selection or nomination for both furnished and unfurnished properties. Most local housing authority stock is let unfurnished, but a significant proportion of properties designed for the elderly or others with support needs will be partly or wholly furnished. The same general pattern is true of the stock made available by other social landlords for nominations from local housing authorities.

5.71 An applicant cannot insist on the provision of (or removal of) furnishings. However, local housing authorities have very broad powers to furnish and fit out their properties and/or sell or hire furniture to tenants. The economies of scale that can be achieved by a local housing authority in bulk-buying furniture and selling it on to incoming tenants should not be underestimated. The golden rule must be that it is always open to an applicant to ask. A local housing authority which responded to a request with a pronouncement that it never provided furniture would be guilty of unlawfully fettering its discretion, and the relevant decision should be quashed in proceedings for judicial review. The question of whether furniture will be provided in lettings by other social landlords will be subject to the terms of any relevant guidance from national regulatory authorities and the terms of that landlord’s own governing instrument (for example, any Articles of Association). However, social landlords have been invited by other commentators to let a greater proportion of their properties on a furnished basis.

1 Housing Act 1985, s 40.
2 See, for example, Why social landlords should provide fully furnished properties, Guardian Housing Network Blog, 20 November 2012.

Quality of accommodation offered

5.72 There is no minimum standard of accommodation that a property must achieve before a local housing authority or other social landlord offers a particular unit to an applicant selected or nominated under a local allocation scheme. Indeed, it may be precisely the least desirable properties that are most frequently on offer.

5.73 In contrast to the law relating to homelessness, there is no requirement that the offered property be ‘suitable’ or ‘available for occupation’. Advisers must be careful to ensure that this distinction between offers under HA 1996, Pts 6 and 7, is made clear to applicants. Of course there may be an overlap: for example, an allocation under HA 1996, Pt 6, may be made to an applicant who is owed a homelessness duty, perhaps in order to release the local housing authority from that duty. Such an allocation would have to be of a ‘suitable’
5.73 Being Allocated a Property

property in order to achieve that effect.\(^1\)

\(^1\) See Chapter 18 of this book for ‘suitable’ and Chapter 10 for the concept of ‘available for occupation’.\(^2\)

\(^3\) For example, in England a homeless applicant owed the main housing duty is free to accept any Pt 6 offer (HA 1996, s 193(6)(c)) but an offer which has been refused must have been ‘suitable’ in order to effect a discharge of that duty (HA 1996, s 193(7)). See Chapter 16. However, in Wales, a homelessness duty owed to an applicant will only come to an end where an applicant accepts or refuses an offer of ‘suitable’ accommodation: \textit{H(W)A} 2014, s 76(2) and (3). See Chapter 17.

5.74 The principle in operation is ‘caveat lessee’ or ‘let the prospective tenant beware’. It is for the prospective tenant to decide whether he or she wants to accept or reject what is offered, having carefully considered it. Accordingly, a tenant who accepts the property can later have no complaint in law if he or she subsequently finds that it is in a more noisy location or situation than expected, or if there is a pungent smell which the tenant erroneously thought could be removed by cleaning.\(^2\)

\(^2\) \textit{Smith v Wrekin Housing Trust} [2004] EWCA Civ 1792, CA. In one case, the Local Government Ombudsman did find the local housing authority guilty of maladministration where it had allocated a property to an applicant which the Ombudsman described as ‘so filthy it could not be lived in’: \textit{Complaint against Nottingham City Council} 05/C/2965, 19 April 2007, (2007) June Legal Action, p 37.

5.75 There is, at present, no general legal rule in England that the properties of a local housing authority landlord or other social landlord must meet minimum standards at the date of letting.\(^1\) The previous statutorily implied term that a property must be ‘fit for human habitation’ at the date of letting currently has no practical application as a result of a failure to up-rate the rent thresholds that govern its operation.\(^2\) What is left is only the old common law rule that a property let furnished (which is itself unusual in social housing)\(^3\) must be fit for occupation at the date of letting.\(^4\) However, at the time of writing the Homes (Fitness for Human Habitation) Bill had passed its second reading in the House of Commons, having secured government backing. If enacted, this would require landlords of residential property, including local housing authority landlords and other social landlords, to ensure that the dwelling is fit for human habitation and remains so throughout the tenancy. In Wales, the Renting Homes (Wales) Act 2016 will also, when brought into force, require that all rented property must be fit for human habitation.\(^5\)

5.76 Of course, a new tenant who finds that the property is unsatisfactory for some reason may give it up, by notice to quit or surrender, if he or she has somewhere else to go, or could pursue a complaint about the allocation (to the social landlord and thereafter to an Ombudsman) and/or apply for a transfer to more satisfactory accommodation under the allocation scheme. The new tenant can, of course, additionally expect that any repairing obligations, imposed on the social landlord by the tenancy agreement, will be met within a reasonable time of commencement of the tenancy.

Offers to transfer applicants

5.77 Where the offer is made to an applicant who is already a tenant of the local housing authority or another social landlord, two particular issues arise:

(1) getting the type of tenancy right; and

(2) determining the old tenancy.

1 For the current policy emphasis on facilitating tenancy transfers see 2.55–2.65.

5.78 If the transferring tenant is currently a secure or assured tenant (but not an assured shorthold tenant), whether under a sole or a joint tenancy, the new tenancy to be offered of any local housing authority property can only be a secure tenancy and not an introductory tenancy, even if the local housing authority normally only offers introductory tenancies to new tenants.

1 HA 1996, s 124(2).

5.79 If the allocation process has resulted in a tenant being nominated to a different social landlord (not currently that tenant’s landlord) and has produced an offer of a tenancy from that landlord, the tenancy may be offered as an assured tenancy or assured shorthold tenancy irrespective of the applicant’s current form of tenancy. In practice, most private registered providers or registered social landlords will offer a full assured tenancy to an incoming tenant who has been the secure or assured tenant of another social landlord.

5.80 Offering an equivalent form of tenancy to that which a transferring social housing tenant has previously enjoyed has become of more acute importance since the changes to security of tenure and succession made in respect of social housing tenancies in England from 1 April 2012 by the Localism Act 2011 and will become even more so when the changes contained in the Housing and Planning Act 2016 come into effect. In order to ensure that transferring tenants – especially those ceasing to be periodic tenants in order to take fixed-term tenancies – do not inadvertently lose accrued rights, the social housing regulator for England requires that:

‘Registered providers shall grant those who were social housing tenants on the day on which section 154 of the Localism Act 2011 comes into force [1 April 2012], and have remained social housing tenants since that date, a tenancy with no less security where they choose to move to another social rented home, whether with the same or another landlord. (This requirement does not apply where tenants choose to move to accommodation let on Affordable Rent terms).’

1 See M Robinson ‘Keep on Moving’ (2012) 152 Adviser 18 on the issues relating to social housing tenants who move within the social housing sector after 1 April 2012.

2 At the time of writing, it is not known if or when this will happen.

3 Tenancy Standard, para 2.2.8 (Homes and Communities Agency, April 2012), part of The regulatory framework for social housing in England from April 2015 (Homes and Communities Agency, March 2015).
5.81 Being Allocated a Property

5.81 It will be important for the local housing authority or other social landlord to ensure that the successful applicant’s current tenancy is brought to an end, or immediately following, the commencement of the new tenancy. Unless (unusually) the tenancy is of the same property, the grant of the new tenancy does not automatically determine the old one. The old tenancy will need to be determined by a tenant’s notice to quit or by surrender, the latter being most safely achieved by deed. If the landlord and tenant have overlooked the need to determine the old tenancy before the new one commences, it will usually be possible for the old one to be immediately surrendered or subject to a notice to quit, with, perhaps, both parties agreeing to short notice.¹

5.82 A common issue will be whether any arrears of rent outstanding on the old tenancy can be transferred to the new one. Although the parties can make an agreement as to how those arrears will be cleared, that agreement cannot be enforced in proceedings for possession of the new home in respect of those arrears, unless either:

1. the parties have agreed that any payments made after the date of transfer will be first applied to meet the old debt, in which case arrears will accrue in the new tenancy unless the tenant makes double payment; or

2. the parties have agreed that compliance with the arrears agreement will be a term of the new tenancy.¹

Refusal of offers

5.83 No applicant can be compelled to accept an offer of accommodation made under a HA 1996, Pt 6 allocation scheme. Where the offer has been made to a homeless applicant, however, the effect of a refusal may, in narrowly prescribed circumstances, operate to bring a homelessness duty to an end.¹

¹ See the discussion in Chapter 15 and Chapter 16 (England) and Chapter 17 (Wales).

5.84 In other cases, the effect (if any) of a refusal will be dealt with in the allocation scheme itself. An applicant who has rejected a property cannot properly be subject to some form of penalty or suspension under an allocation scheme unless a rule to that effect appears in the published scheme and has been properly applied.¹ Indeed, even if such a provision did appear in a published scheme, if the scheme itself was based on a needs-led priority system, it would be difficult to impose any sanction unless the refusal itself evidenced a change in assessed need. However, a period of deferral resulting from the refusal of an offer would, it seems, be lawful where such a refusal was a reasonable matter for an allocation scheme to take into account in affording relative priority between applicants.²

5.85 If the penalty provision for a refusal is legitimately included in a local allocation scheme, the local housing authority must still ensure that its operation is considered on a case-by-case basis, having regard to the circumstances of each refusal. Indeed, many allocation schemes make provision for ‘appeals’ against, or for the ‘review’ of offers, made under the scheme and a significant proportion of such challenges made are successful. The Welsh Code recommends that the allocation scheme should include rights to a review for those penalised by refusal of an offer. The inclusion or application of a penalty can, of course, be challenged by way of judicial review if the local housing authority is not willing to waive it in any particular case.

2. A survey conducted in 2006/07 found that a significant proportion of appeals had been upheld. The average ‘appeal success rate’ (‘success’ from an applicant perspective) was 40%: Exploring local authority policy and practice on housing allocations (CLG, July 2009), para 2.14.

5.86 The local housing authority must also be clear that an applicant has in fact refused a property before imposing any sanction. The local housing authority should not act solely on information received from a third party but should confirm this with the applicant him or herself.

DEFINITIONS

6.1 As a result of changes to the relevant statutory provisions in England and Wales, there are now several different technical descriptions of the major social landlords that may be involved in the allocation of social housing. They are:

1) registered providers of social housing in England\(^1\), of which there are two sub-categories:
   a) public registered providers ie local housing authority landlords; and
   b) private registered providers (mainly housing associations);
2) social landlords in Wales, of which there are two sub-categories:
   a) local housing authority landlords; and
   b) registered social landlords\(^2\).

\(^1\) Registered providers in England, of both categories, are regulated by the Regulation Committee of the Homes and Communities Agency, following amendments made by the Localism Act 2011, Pt 7 to the Housing and Regeneration Act 2008 with effect from 1 April 2012. See 1.31–1.35.

\(^2\) Registered social landlords in Wales are regulated by the Welsh Ministers pursuant to the provisions of Housing Act 1996, Pt 1. See 1.36–1.39.
6.2 Lettings by Social Landlords (other than Local Housing Authorities)

6.2 This chapter is concerned with lettings by social landlords other than local housing authority landlords ie by private registered providers in England and by registered social landlords in Wales.¹

OVERVIEW

6.3 In England, the stock of social housing for rent owned by private registered providers now exceeds two million units. In Wales, the number of homes owned by registered social landlords is over 141,000². With the development of new housing schemes, the acquisition of properties through funding from the Homes & Communities Agency (in England) and the Welsh Government, and the transfer of local housing authority homes to other social landlords, that stock had been gradually increasing and in Wales is still the case². In England, however, the number of private registered provider dwellings has not increased since 2014³ and with the planned introduction of the right-to-buy for private registered provider tenants in England the number may remain static or even start to fall⁴. Nevertheless, these social landlords now hold more housing stock for rent than do local housing authorities. In consequence, significantly more lettings of social housing homes in England are now made by private registered providers than by local housing authorities⁴.

⁵ In England in 2015/16 there were 110,312 general needs lettings by private registered providers and 89,206 such lettings by local housing authorities. There were a further 79,159 lettings of supported housing by private registered providers and only 11,383 such lettings by local housing authorities. In 2016/17 private registered providers made 65% of all social lettings in England compared to 60% in 2007/08. Social housing lettings: April 2016–March 2017, England (MHCLG, January 2018).

6.4 However, there is no equivalent in this part of the social housing sector to the over-arching statutory control on allocations imposed on local housing
Overview 6.6

6.5 A private registered provider or registered social landlord may deal with the letting of its homes in a number of ways. For example:

- It may, if it chooses – operate a transfer scheme enabling its existing tenants to seek alternative homes within its stock. Most such landlords take that course1.
- For non-transfer applicants, a private registered provider or registered social landlord may operate an ‘open list’ or ‘direct applications’ system so that anyone who applies may be considered for a tenancy in its stock, and it may then order or organise that list in such manner as it chooses.
- It may, additionally or alternatively, make available some part or the majority of its stock to the local housing authority or other social landlords to make nominations of prospective tenants – whom it may then accept or reject as it pleases2.
- It may, if it chooses, advertise its available properties through a choice-based letting scheme. That may be the social landlord’s own scheme, a scheme operated jointly with a local housing authority, or even a common scheme shared with other social landlords and local housing authorities.

1 See 6.60–6.65.
2 For ‘nominations’ see 6.25–6.59.
3 For ‘common schemes’ see 6.53–6.59.

6.6 The relative freedom enjoyed by private registered providers and registered social landlords is held in check only by the requirements of the national regulatory authorities. In England, the regulator is the Homes & Communities Agency’s Regulation Committee1. It has the power to set standards to be followed by the providers of social housing2. Those standards require registered providers of social housing to comply with specified rules about criteria for allocating housing accommodation3. The current regulatory standards are contained in *The Regulatory framework for social housing in England from April 2015*4. The Housing and Regeneration Act 2008 gives the regulator considerable powers of inspection and enforcement to ensure that these standards are complied with5. The regulator issues regulatory standards to social housing providers as directed by the Secretary of State6.

1 On 11 January 2018 the Homes and Communities Agency’s investment arm adopted the trading name of Homes England whilst the regulation directorate re-named itself the Regulator of Social Housing. At the time of writing, a draft Statutory Instrument was before Parliament (the Legislative Reform (Regulator of Social Housing) Order 2018) which if made will abolish the Regulation Committee of the Homes and Communities Agency, create a Regulator of Social Housing, and transfer the functions of the Regulation Committee to the Regulator of Social Housing. The way in which registered providers of social housing are regulated is not expected to change.

6 The current directions are set out at Annex A of Implementing Social Housing reform: Directions to the Social Housing Regulator – Consultation: a summary of responses (DCLG, November 2011).

6.7 In Wales, the regulatory function falls to the Welsh Ministers. A Housing Regulation Team undertakes the regulation activity on their behalf and its work is overseen by the Regulatory Board for Wales. Under HA 1996, s 33A the Welsh Ministers may set performance standards to be met by registered social landlords in connection with their functions relating to the provision of housing. The Welsh Ministers may issue guidance relating to and amplifying a performance standard under HA 1996, s 33B. The current performance standards and guidance are contained within The Regulatory Framework for Housing Associations Registered in Wales.

6.8 Some of the largest private registered providers and registered social landlords are those that were created specifically to acquire the housing stock of particular local housing authorities in large scale voluntary transfers. Most local housing authorities engaging in such transfers took the opportunity, before transfer of their stock, to entrench the new social landlord’s future arrangements for allocation of the transferred stock (and, in some cases, allocation of stock subsequently acquired) through contractual commitments. Those contractual obligations operate as a fetter on the freedom in letting that most other social landlords enjoy.

1 For contractual ‘nomination agreements’ see 6.25–6.43.

6.9 A private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s responsibility in housing allocation may not necessarily be confined to the letting of its own stock. Several have contracted to operate housing allocation services for local housing authorities. Those services are contracted out to them pursuant to the arrangements described in Chapter 21 of this book. Such a social landlord may thus find itself directly allocating some of its own stock, managing allocation of local housing authority stock and also operating the local housing authority’s system for nomination of prospective tenants to itself. However, even in a situation where functions are contracted out to a social landlord, which acquired the stock through a large-scale transfer, local housing authorities must remain active participants in allocation arrangements.

1 For contracting out of allocation functions see 6.66–6.68.
2 See 6.66–6.68.
3 One survey found that at least a significant minority of local housing authorities had unlawfully treated a large scale transfer, combined with the contracting out of allocation arrangements, as releasing them from any further concern with the allocation of that housing: Exploring local authority policy and practice on housing allocations (DCLG 2009, paras 2.15–2.16).
DIRECT APPLICATIONS

Duty to maintain a lettings policy

6.10 Most, if not all, private registered providers or registered social landlords retain at least some of their available housing stock for lettings to new applicants – those who have directly applied to that social landlord for housing (direct applications) – or to their own current tenants who wish to move within their stock. Lettings to current tenants are dealt with separately later in this chapter.¹

6.11 The private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s governing body will have adopted a lettings policy relating to direct applications (and other lettings) and there will usually be a procedure guide or manual setting out the way in which housing staff are to implement the policy. In 2015/16, 42% of general needs lettings by private registered providers in England were to direct applicants.¹

¹ Social Housing Lettings in England, 2016–17: Continuous Recording (CORE) Summary Tables (MHCLG, January 2018), Table 3j.

6.12 As Chapters 1–5 of this book have explained, HA 1996, Pt 6, requires local housing authorities, but not other social landlords, to incorporate a statement of their policies for selection priorities and lettings procedures into a single local allocation scheme, copies of which must be available on request. A similar, but not precisely the same, statutory obligation is cast on private registered providers and registered social landlords by Housing Act 1985, s 106. This requires any ‘landlord authority’ (a term defined to embrace private registered providers and registered social landlords)² to maintain two sets of rules:

(1) the rules for determining priority as between applicants in the allocation of its housing accommodation;² and
(2) the rules which it has laid down governing the procedure to be followed in allocating its housing accommodation.³

³ Housing Act 1985, s 106(2)(a).

6.13 A private registered provider or registered social landlord is under a statutory duty to publish a summary of the first set of rules but not of the second.⁴ Although any applicant can ask for a full copy of both sets of rules, there is no statutory duty to make them available at the landlord’s offices. Copies need only be sent to the relevant statutory regulator and to any local housing authority in the district of which the social landlord still has stock let on secure tenancies.⁵ An applicant could inspect the rules, or take copies of them, at the office of any such local housing authority. All the regulatory guidance, reproduced earlier in this chapter, emphasises the need for transparency and fairness in fixing the terms of, and operating allocation schemes – although it falls short of requiring the production and publication of a formal lettings policy or allocation scheme.

Guidance on contents of lettings policies

6.14 Statutory guidance on the content of allocation policies is limited. In England, the current regulatory standard for housing allocation in England (part of a broader Tenancy Standard) provides¹:

‘1 Allocations and mutual exchange

1.1 Registered providers shall let their homes in a fair, transparent and efficient way. They shall take into account the housing needs and aspirations of tenants and potential tenants. They shall demonstrate how their lettings:

• make the best use of available housing
• are compatible with the purpose of the housing
• contribute to local authorities’ strategic housing function and sustainable communities

There should be clear application, decision-making and appeals processes.’

¹ Tenancy Standard (Homes and Communities Agency, April 2012), part of The regulatory framework for social housing in England from April 2015 (Homes and Communities Agency, March 2015). The passages of the current regulatory standard dealing with mutual exchange have not been reproduced in these extracts.

6.15 The regulatory standard then sets out the following Specific Expectations¹:

1.1 Registered providers shall co-operate with local authorities’ strategic housing function, and their duties to meet identified local housing needs. This includes assistance with local authorities’ homelessness duties, and through meeting obligations in nominations agreements.

1.2 Registered providers shall develop and deliver services to address under-occupation and overcrowding in their homes, within the resources available to them. These services should be focused on the needs of their tenants, and will offer choices to them.

1.3 Registered providers’ published policies shall include how they have made use of common housing registers, common allocations policies and local letting policies. Registered providers shall clearly set out, and be able to give reasons for, the criteria they use for excluding actual and potential tenants from consideration for allocations, mobility or mutual exchange schemes.

1.4 Registered providers shall develop and deliver allocations processes in a way which supports their effective use by the full range of actual and potential tenants, including those with support needs, those who do not speak English as a first language and others who have difficulties with written English.

1.5 Registered providers shall minimise the time that properties are empty between each letting. When doing this, they shall take into account the circumstances of the tenants who have been offered the properties.
1.6 Registered providers shall record all lettings and sales as required by the Continuous Recording of Lettings (CORE) system.

1.7 Registered providers shall provide tenants wishing to move with access to clear and relevant advice about their housing options.

Tenancy Standard (Homes and Communities Agency, April 2012), part of The regulatory framework for social housing in England from April 2015 (Homes and Communities Agency, March 2015).

6.16 In Wales, the current guidance is even less detailed. The revised Regulatory Framework for Housing Associations Registered in Wales has the stated purpose of improving and strengthening the Welsh Government’s approach to regulation but the guidance it provides in respect of allocations is minimal. Performance Standard 5 requires registered social landlords to demonstrate ‘A track record of achieving positive outcomes, responding appropriately to new challenges and performance issues’. The guidance accompanying this standard recommends that the association demonstrate ‘how lettings make the best use of available housing, compatible with the core purpose of the Registered Social Landlord’.

6.17 More general guidance is available in the introduction to the Framework, which confirms that the Framework is underpinned by the ‘principles of proportionality, transparency and openness, consistency and promotion of learning and development’.

6.18 This guidance is, in part, supplemented by provisions in the Welsh Code, which suggests that registered social landlords are required by their regulators to retain responsibility for their own allocations policies. The Welsh Government’s Housing Association Circular RSL 004/15 directs registered social landlords in Wales to ‘take account’ of the Welsh Code when addressing their key delivery outcomes reproduced above. The Welsh Code suggests that registered social landlords in Wales:

- consider carefully the information they provide about their allocation policies;
- should not involve board members in decision-making on individual allocations; and
- should monitor their allocation outcomes.

Welsh Code, para 4.16.

6.19 Private registered providers and registered social landlords must also ensure that their lettings policies comply with the requirements of the general law. In particular, private registered providers and registered social landlords must comply with their obligations under the Equality Act 2010. Allocating social housing is a public function and private registered providers or registered social landlords exercising those functions will constitute public bodies when doing so. This means that they must comply with the public sector equality duty, which requires public authorities to:
6.19 Lettings by Social Landlords (other than Local Housing Authorities)

1. have due regard to the need to—
   (a) eliminate discrimination, harassment, victimisation and any other conduct that is prohibited by or under this Act;
   (b) advance equality of opportunity between persons who share a relevant protected characteristic and persons who do not share it;
   (c) foster good relations between persons who share a relevant protected characteristic and persons who do not share it.

In addition, lettings policies must not unlawfully discriminate under either the Equality Act 2010 or Art 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

6.20 Private registered providers and registered social landlords must also ensure that their functions are discharged having regard to the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of children. This applies not only to the formulation of their lettings policies but also to their decisions in individual cases.

6.21 The limited nature of the guidance suggests, as already indicated, that, subject to the constraints of the general law as referred to above, private registered providers and registered social landlords have a relatively free hand in the arrangements they make for direct applications and in the organisation of what will usually be a waiting list where demand exceeds supply. They may, for example, include policies explaining:

- how applications will be prioritised;
- in what circumstances, if any, applicants will be excluded or suspended from their schemes;
- whether access is to be restricted to those with a particular connection to an area; and
- what choice applicants will be given before being allocated a property.

In short, it is for each private registered provider or registered social landlord to set its own categories for prioritising applicants and its own arrangements for allocating particular properties.

1. In Complaint against Cymdeithas Tai Eryri (Public Services Ombudsman for Wales, ref 201102854, 2012) the registered social landlord had a policy enabling it to suspend a housing application for 'unacceptable behaviour' of a type making the applicant unsuitable to be a tenant but it wrongly used that policy to suspend an applicant for providing misleading information in an application form. The Ombudsman said that if it wished to suspend for that reason, its published policies should be amended to make that clear. The Welsh Government has indicated (Welsh Code, paras 2.44(vii) and 2.45) that it is in the process of developing regulatory guidance which will require that registered social landlords restrict access to housing only in circumstances which mirror the unacceptable behaviour provisions under HA 1996, Pt 6, but none has been forthcoming at the time of writing.
Nominations by local housing authorities 6.26

Information about lettings policies and procedure

6.22 The starting point for any applicant considering a direct application to any particular private registered provider or registered social landlord will be to obtain details of its letting scheme. The obligation of a private registered provider or registered social landlord to have a scheme and make it available is described at 6.12.

6.23 Although no applicant for a direct letting has a statutory right to make an application, or even to be informed of the outcome, the regulatory guidance suggests at least some basic procedural requirements should be observed. The guidance for England requires that ‘clear application, decision-making and appeals processes’ are in place and that allocations processes are developed and delivered ‘in a way which supports their effective use by the full range of actual and potential tenants, including those with support needs, those who do not speak English as a first language and others who have difficulties with written English’.

Disputes about direct lettings

6.24 A dissatisfied applicant under a direct letting scheme has access to a range of options to press matters beyond any internal review or appeal opportunity that the scheme itself may contain. Disputes may be progressed through complaints procedures, with the relevant social housing regulator, to the Housing Ombudsman or Public Services Ombudsman for Wales and/or through the courts.

The legal basis

6.25 HA 1996, Pt 6, requires that every private registered provider or registered social landlord will, on request from a local housing authority, ‘co-operate to such extent as is reasonable in the circumstances in offering accommodation to people with priority under the authority’s allocation scheme’.

Disputes about direct lettings

6.26 This statutory obligation to co-operate over housing allocation arises only ‘on request’. A generic request from a local housing authority might cause a private registered provider or registered social landlord to offer nomination arrangements or to negotiate a common housing register or some other joint scheme with the requesting local housing authority. But the request may also be applicant specific. The local housing authority may, for example, owe a duty to accommodate a particular applicant needing accommodation of a particular type held by the private registered provider or registered social landlord and may make a request accordingly.

1 HA 1996, s 170.

6.27 The duty to co-operate is limited to ‘such extent as is reasonable in the circumstances’. A reasonable response to such a request might include an invitation to the local housing authority to transfer a unit of its stock to the private registered provider or registered social landlord or to accept a reciprocal nomination in return for the provision of the requested assistance.

6.28 The duty is not, however, restricted to requiring co-operation in respect of those in the statutory ‘reasonable preference’ categories. A local housing authority may also have identified other applicants in its scheme as having ‘priority’.

1 See Chapter 4 of this book at 4.159–4.164.

6.29 This provision is the only statutory underpinning for strategic co-operation between local housing authorities and private registered providers or registered social landlords. Presumably Parliament expected that formal arrangements for day-to-day co-operation between local housing authorities and other social landlords would be set out in individually negotiated agreements. These locally agreed arrangements may be highly informal or, at the other extreme, may be set out in legally binding contractual documents.

6.30 The latter are more common in the cases of those private registered providers or registered social landlords which have taken a large-scale transfer of local housing authority stock. Indeed, the arrangements governing stock transfers from local housing authority landlords to private registered providers in England now expressly state that a local housing authority submitting a request for ministerial consent to transfer its stock must supply ‘the transfer contract’ governing the sale of the housing and the relationship between the local authority and the private registered provider and that that contract ‘should include all agreements entered into by the local authority and private registered provider in respect of the transfer’.

1 Housing Transfer Manual: Period to 31 March 2016, para 6.11. The matter was also covered in non-statutory guidance Housing Allocation, Homelessness and Stock Transfer – A Guide to Key Issues (ODPM, 2004) and, in Wales, the Welsh Government Housing Transfer Guidelines 2009 (see Welsh Code, para 4.18).

2 Housing Transfer Manual: Period to 31 March 2016, para 7.2.

6.31 Save in those cases where the private registered provider or registered social landlord has entered into a contractual commitment to take local housing authority nominations, however, there is no legal obligation on that landlord to agree to take local housing authority nominations, either generally or for specific properties.
Guidance on co-operation

6.32 In the absence of any strict legal obligation, the matter of private registered provider or registered social landlord participation in nomination arrangements is simply another issue covered by the current statutory guidance.

6.33 The statutory Codes of Guidance issued to local housing authorities in England and Wales concerning housing allocation contain very little guidance about nominations to private registered providers or registered social landlords, in contrast to the ample non-statutory guidance1. The current statutory guidance in England simply suggests that nomination agreements should identify:

- the proportion of lettings that will be made available;
- any criteria which the private registered provider has adopted for accepting or rejecting nominees; and
- how any disputes will be resolved2.

1 See, for example, Effective Co-operation in Tackling Homelessness: Nomination Agreements and Exclusion produced jointly by Communities and Local Government (formerly the ODPM), the Housing Corporation, the National Housing Federation and the Local Government Association in November 2004 and Building Bridges: A guide to better partnership working between local authorities and housing associations, published by the Chartered Institute of Housing in association with the Association of Retained Council Housing and VIVID Housing, September 2017.
2 English Code, para 6.3.

6.34 Local housing authorities are encouraged by the same guidance to monitor effective delivery of the nomination agreement so they can demonstrate they are meeting their obligations under Pt 61. Those ‘obligations’ are presumably the obligations to ensure that those in the prescribed categories are actually being afforded the ‘reasonable preference’ to which HA 1996, Pt 6, entitles them.

1 English Code, para 6.3.
2 Chapter 4 of this book.

6.35 The present Welsh Code provides that registered social landlords in Wales should actively work with local housing authorities to help them fulfil their functions and deliver good housing outcomes3. It expressly encourages partnership working between local housing authorities and registered social landlords in order to meet the needs of the local community and maximise the best use of the housing stock available4. It also advises that local housing authorities should develop common policies on restricting access to allocations with partner registered social landlords to maximise consistency in approach and improve efficiency in nominations procedures5 and suggests that, where a local housing authority has transferred its stock to a registered social landlord, it is important that the local housing authority and registered social landlord have a clear nomination agreement and effective arrangements for allocations6.

6.36 Lettings by Social Landlords (other than Local Housing Authorities)

6.36 Some guidance on the subject has also been given by the relevant national regulators. In England, the guidance requires co-operation with ‘local authorities’ strategic housing functions, and their duties to meet identified local housing needs. This includes assistance with local housing authorities’ homelessness duties, and through meeting obligations in nominations agreements.\(^1\) The Welsh Regulatory Framework simply stipulates that housing associations are accountable to organisations, ‘such as local authorities’ that ‘play a vital role in meeting local housing needs’\(^2\).

\(^1\) See the extract set out at 6.15.

6.37 In parallel to all the emphasis in the old statutory guidance in England on the negotiating position of local housing authorities, in formulating nomination agreements, the now defunct Housing Corporation, for its part, reminded housing associations of the need to protect their own interests. Its guidance stated that, in order to preserve such a landlord’s independence, any nomination agreement must:

- reflect the housing association’s own objectives both as set out in its governing instrument and as agreed by the governing body;
- be approved by the governing body;
- be subject to regular and timely review; and
- run for such a term as would enable the parties to exit from it should circumstances or requirements change.\(^1\)

\(^1\) Housing Corporation Circular 02/03, para 4.2. See also Building Bridges: A guide to better partnership working between local authorities and housing associations, published by the Chartered Institute of Housing in association with the Association of Retained Council Housing and VIVID Housing, September 2017.

6.38 This advice was mirrored in the previous version of the English Homelessness Code of Guidance, now withdrawn, which reminded local housing authorities to:

‘bear in mind that RSLs are required to retain their independence. They must honour their constitutional obligations under their diverse governing instruments, and will make the final decision on the allocation of their housing, within their regulatory framework.’\(^1\)

This advice has not been replicated in the current English Homelessness Code of Guidance.\(^2\)

6.39 Most nomination agreements also include ‘carve out’ provisions designed to allow registered social landlords to refuse applicants in appropriate circumstances. One report has recommended that these ‘take account of the association’s objectives and policies, striking a balance between the duty to cooperate and an association’s right to refuse a nomination that is not
Co-operation in practice

6.40 Arrangements made between a private registered provider or registered social landlord and any particular local housing authority may provide for that local housing authority to nominate applicants for general consideration by that landlord, or for consideration for a particular property, or may involve the private registered provider or registered social landlord supplying details of its premises to be advertised as available to nominees under a local housing authority’s choice-based letting scheme.

6.41 From the perspective of the local housing authority, nominating an applicant to be an assured tenant of housing accommodation held by a private registered provider or registered social landlord constitutes an ‘allocation’ of accommodation – unless it falls within one of the exceptions discussed in CHAPTER 11 – and is therefore governed by the local allocation scheme adopted by that particular local housing authority.

6.42 In practice, most private registered providers and registered social landlords co-operate to the extent of making at least some proportion of their lettings available to applicants who are nominees of local housing authorities. Indeed, in England in 2015/16, more than 44% of general needs lettings by private registered providers were made to local housing authority nominees.

6.43 However, a report published in September 2017 found that the relationship between local housing authorities and private registered providers had come under strain in recent years. The root of the problem was said to be Government decisions to ‘refocus’ social registered landlords’ programmes towards shared ownership, intermediate rent, and Affordable Rent. This had led to a ‘sharp decline’ in the availability of properties at social rents, with some private registered providers even questioning whether they could provide such accommodation at all. At the same time, local housing authorities were using their powers under the Localism Act 2011 to ‘severely trim’ their lists with the results that the registers ‘tend to focus on applicants for social rent lettings’ and did not ‘generate the steady stream of appropriate applicants for housing association Affordable Rent, intermediate and market rent, and homeownership products’. In addition to this, welfare reform was adversely affecting applicants’ ability to afford properties for which they were nominated, with the result that ‘Housing associations feel that some local authorities are nominating households who cannot afford their homes and are

6.44 Where private registered providers or registered social landlords and local housing authorities are working closely together over social housing allocation, there will inevitably be a need to share information. But information sharing relating to the particulars of individual applicants requires very careful handling.

6.45 Those who have applied to a local housing authority for accommodation under HA 1996, Pt 6, have the statutory assurance that even the simple fact that they have applied will not be shared with others (including private registered providers or registered social landlords) without their consent,\(^1\) as well as the protection of the General Data Protection Regulation and the Data Protection Act 2018.\(^2\). It will therefore be essential for the local housing authority to have the written consent of each and every applicant before sharing access to such information with a private registered provider or registered social landlord.

2. See 2.30.

6.46 Against this background, both the former Housing Corporation and previous UK governments produced publications designed to help local housing authorities and private registered providers or registered social landlords to resolve information sharing issues\(^1\).

‘Failed’ or ‘problematic’ nominations

6.47 A particular difficulty with the operation of nomination agreements, in practice, has been the rejection of nominated applicants by private registered providers or registered social landlords. These have been described as ‘failed nominations’ or ‘problematic nominations’\(^1\). In a survey conducted in October 2013, local housing authorities were ‘concerned that housing associations are refusing their nominations’ and the researchers reported that ‘this is a particular problem for non-stock holding authorities who have homelessness duties to discharge’\(^3\).

1. D Cowan et al Problematic Nominations (School of Law, Bristol University, December 2007).
Nominations by local housing authorities 6.50

6.48 Three common reasons for rejection of nominations have been identified. The first cause is information mismatching, i.e., the local housing authority and the private registered provider or registered social landlord both hold information about the applicant, but the content differs. For their part, local housing authorities should provide details about nominated households that are clear, comprehensive, and up to date, including any available information about vulnerability, support needs, and arrangements for support. Failure to get this sort of information sharing right could undermine a nomination process, whilst getting it right will ensure the best chances of new tenancies being sustained.

6.49 A second common reason for failed nominations occurs where applicants, whilst meeting the local housing authority’s criteria for nomination (under the local allocation scheme), do not meet the particular private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s letting criteria for the specific property (or, in some cases, for any letting by that social landlord). All such criteria should, of course, be the subject of consultation and subsequent incorporation into the written nominations agreement between the particular private registered provider or registered social landlord and the local housing authority. If rejection of nominations on these grounds occurs frequently, it may seriously impair a local housing authority’s statutory obligations, e.g., to give a “reasonable preference” to particular categories of its applicants.

1 For a recent discussion of the issue see Housing associations should have some say in who lives in their homes, Guardian Housing Network Blog, 12 August 2014 and Why housing associations should not be able to pick and choose their tenants, Guardian Housing Network Blog, 15 August 2014.

2 See 6.25–6.43.

3 For the meaning of “reasonable preference”, see Chapter 4 of this book.

6.50 The particular problems arising from inconsistent criteria relating to nominated applicants are thrown into sharp focus when accommodation made available for local housing authority nominees by a private registered provider or registered social landlord is advertised through the local housing authority’s choice-based lettings scheme. The highest ranked bidder for that property will expect to be offered the tenancy if he or she meets the local housing authority’s own criteria and will not expect to be denied it for failing to meet the private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s criteria, e.g., because the housing association landlord has wider exclusion criteria than the local housing authority or because it gives particular emphasis to local connection or local lettings policies. In an attempt to avoid such difficulties, the now-withdrawn English CBL Code advised that:

‘the exclusion policy of each participating RSL should be clearly set out in the published CBL scheme details. In addition, where this is feasible, the exclusion criteria applied by an RSL should be stated in the advertisement of any relevant vacancy, so that applicants are clear about the basis on which the property is offered.

1 As to ‘legitimate expectation’ in the housing allocation context see 4.50–4.53.
2 English CBL Code, para 6.7. The code was reproduced in the second edition of this book at Appendix 1.

6.51 Because most nominations will be made under the auspices of the local housing authority’s own allocation scheme, it will be the local housing authority which has ultimate responsibility to the applicant for any difficulties. It may well be that an aggrieved applicant seeks redress against that local housing authority. However, a ‘nominated’ applicant will also have access to avenues of redress against the private registered provider or registered social landlord, where appropriate.

1 See 6.69–6.81.

6.52 If a private registered provider or registered social landlord does not co-operate in the face of a request from the local housing authority, the local housing authority could pursue the matter with the relevant regulator or through the courts (because the statutory duty is mandatory). Alternatively, the individual (if there is one) who is the subject of the request could use the private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s complaints procedure or could pursue one of the other means of redress. However, the better course is obviously for the degree and level of co-operation to be improved. Research conducted in October 2013 found that 40% of the local housing authority and private registered provider respondents were reportedly ‘working to strengthen relationships with their partners with a view to resolving differences and challenges’.

1 HA 1996, s 170 says ‘shall co-operate’ (emphasis added).

Common housing registers and allocation schemes

6.53 Some local housing authorities and private registered providers or registered social landlords choose to operate common housing registers and/or common allocation schemes. The former was defined in the English CBL Code as an arrangement under which a local housing authority and another social landlord developed a single list or database of all applicants for housing allocation who had applied to either of them. The latter consists of a framework for enabling common criteria to be applied in assessing applications (eg to ascertain eligibility and priority). As a report on such matters in Wales indicated:

‘The presence of a common housing register in an authority area is not necessarily a requisite for a common allocations policy. 29% of respondents have common registers but no common allocations policy. However, in the 3 authorities where a common allocations policy is in operation, 2 of the authorities also have a common register operating3.

1 Reproduced in the second edition of this book at Appendix 1.
2 English CBL Code, para 6.16.
3 Homelessness Strategy Working Group Report: Housing Association Lettings (Community Housing Cymru).

6.54 The modern impetus for the adoption of ‘common’ allocation schemes between local housing authorities and other social landlords in England was given in August 2008 by publication of the English CBL Code in which the Secretary of State recommended that all local housing authorities work with other social housing partners to provide ‘joint choice-based lettings schemes which extend to all or the majority’ of local social housing vacancies1. The Secretary of State considered that the adoption of common housing registers had advantages:

• for applicants (because a single application form and a single access point obviates the need to register separately);
• for local housing authorities (because the register provides a more reliable assessment of housing need in their districts, providing important information for the development of their housing strategy, and enabling the best use to be made of existing stock)2; and
• more generally, because the process of negotiating and drawing up such registers can build trust between local housing authority partners and other social landlords3.

6.55 The current regulatory guidance in England contains no particular recommendations on such arrangements and the regulatory guidance in Wales is silent on the issue. However, the Welsh Code is emphasises the advantages of common housing registers1 and provides its own list of their perceived benefits:

• they provide a single point of access to all social housing in the area;
• they help improve joint working between an authority and housing associations and help in meeting strategic housing objectives;
• they support the development of more strategically planned and integrated lettings schemes in an area;
• they give a better understanding of the pattern of local housing needs; and
• they can reduce void levels2.

1 Welsh Code, para 3.52 and 4.12–4.18.
2 Welsh Code, para 4.12. See too Welsh Code, para 3.52, reporting that 90% of housing associations in Wales are part of at least one common housing register.

6.56 Nevertheless, considerable care is needed in drawing up such schemes. As already explained1, if an applicant on the common register is applying for a property to be let directly by a private registered provider or registered social landlord, the only eligibility criteria will be those adopted by that social landlord. But if the applicant is going to be a local housing authority nominee for a private registered provider or registered social landlord vacancy, the statutory eligibility or qualification criteria of HA 1996, Pt 6, and the local housing allocation scheme must be met.

1 See 6.4–6.8 and 6.14–6.21.
2 Those terms are explained in Chapter 3.

6.57 These complications are thrown into even sharper relief when a private registered provider or registered social landlord participates in a common registration scheme with more than one local housing authority or with a number of local housing authorities and other social landlords. Ambitious plans to amalgamate registers and allocations policies, to produce common schemes, involving private registered providers or registered social landlords but run by a single central organisation exercising the delegated powers of all participants, have run into difficulties. Previous statutory guidance in England has advised that local housing authorities cannot use their general statutory powers of delegation to operate such common lettings schemes together with other social landlords although ‘it would be possible to include within such a scheme [those] vacancies to which a local authority had nomination rights’.

1 English CBL Code, para 7.8.

6.58 All social landlords have also been encouraged to monitor their participation in choice-based lettings schemes with other local housing authority and social landlord partners. Where private registered provider or registered social landlord property is advertised through a joint choice-based lettings scheme in which the private registered provider or registered social landlord participates with local housing authorities which each have their own allocation scheme:

(1) the partners in the scheme should be clear as to which local housing authority is the nominating local housing authority; and
(2) there should be clear information available for applicants as to which local housing authority’s allocation scheme applies to that property (and therefore how priority will be determined).

1 See, for example, Welsh Code, para 4.50.

6.59 In the latest supplementary statutory guidance on housing allocation issued to local housing authorities in England (the ‘Supplementary English Code’)’, the Secretary of State acknowledged that common allocation policies are operating in some areas and advised as follows in relation to the consequences of the adoption, by one or more of the participants, of a qualifying class limited by residence requirements:

‘We are aware that in some parts of the country, housing authorities share a common allocation policy with their neighbours and may wish to adopt a broader residency test which would be met if an applicant lives in any of the partners’ districts. Such an approach might be particularly appropriate where an established housing market area spans a number of local authority districts, and could help promote labour mobility within a wider geographical area.’

1 The Supplementary English Code – Providing social housing for local people (DCLG, December 2013) – is reproduced in Appendix I.

2 The Supplementary English Code, para 14.

TRANSFERS (CURRENT TENANTS WHO WANT TO MOVE)

6.60 All private registered providers and registered social landlords will have arrangements in place to handle the receipt, and subsequent determination, of requests from existing tenants to move to other homes within that landlord’s stock, ie applications from tenants seeking a transfer. Indeed, in 2015/16 in England 15.4% of general needs lettings by private registered providers were internal transfers.

1 Social Housing Lettings in England, 2016–17: Continuous Recording (CORE) Summary Tables (MHCLG, January 2018), Table 2f.

6.61 The applicable statutory requirements are minimal. They only oblige the minority of private registered providers or registered social landlords which have secure tenants to publish a summary of their transfer rules governing cases where their secure tenants wish to move to other dwelling-houses let under secure tenancies by that landlord. Where that obligation does apply, the private registered provider or registered social landlord must also make a copy of the transfer rules available at its principal office for inspection at all reasonable hours, without charge, by members of the public.

1 Housing Act 1985, s 106(1). Private registered providers and registered social landlords will usually only have ‘secure tenants’ if they were letting properties before early 1989 (when Housing Act 1988 introduced the assured tenancy for most housing association lettings).

2 Housing Act 1985, s 106(1).

6.62 Although the adoption of such transfer arrangements (ie published transfer rules and policies) might be thought in any event to represent sensible housing management for all private registered providers or registered social landlords, the matter has in the past been the subject of statutory guidance. Housing associations were previously directed to ensure that their written lettings policies ‘take account of the need to give reasonable priority to transfer applicants’.

2 See 6.15.

6.63 If all the stock of a particular private registered provider and registered social landlord is ring-fenced for allocation only through a nomination arrangement or a common allocation scheme, some requests for transfers will fail because they would not meet the criteria for allocation under those arrangements or schemes.
6.63 Lettings by Social Landlords (other than Local Housing Authorities)

See, for an example, the facts of R (Fidelis-Auma) v Octavia Housing & Care [2009] EWHC 2263 (Admin), (2009) November Legal Action, p 23, Admin Ct.

6.64 The precise detail of a particular private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s internal transfer scheme is not regulated by any statutory parameters or guidance and such landlords have, essentially, a free rein. This is, of course, subject to the constraints of the general law (eg the need to avoid unlawful discrimination) and the requirement to act fairly and in accordance with the particular landlord’s own published scheme. The private registered provider or registered social landlord may even differentiate between the criteria it applies to transfer applicants and those applying to direct applicants. For example, the now-withdrawn Housing Corporation Circular 02/07 suggested that a housing association may take a stricter view of the effect of rent arrears on eligibility for allocation if the arrears are owed by its own tenant.

This requirement is discussed further (in the context of judicial review) in Chapter 19.
Circular 02/07: Tenancy Management: Eligibility and Evictions (Housing Corporation, April 2007).

6.65 The published information generally provided by the private registered provider or registered social landlord about its lettings arrangements should be made available to transfer applicants. Complaints by, and redress for, dissatisfied transfer applicants are considered later in this chapter.

See generally Chapter 21.

PRIVATE REGISTERED PROVIDERS OR REGISTERED SOCIAL LANDLORDS AS LOCAL HOUSING AUTHORITY CONTRACTORS

6.66 Local housing authorities may not contract out of ultimate responsibility for the local housing allocation scheme. Responsibility for adopting or altering the scheme, for the principles of the scheme, for consulting social landlords and for ensuring that the allocation scheme is available for inspection by the public cannot be contracted out. However, local housing authorities may contract out the functions of:

- inviting and/or receiving applications;
- making inquiries into an application;
- making decisions as to eligibility or qualification;
- carrying out reviews of decisions;
- making arrangements to secure that advice, information and necessary assistance is available; and
- making the actual allocation decision, arranging the tenancy sign-up, etc.

See generally Chapter 21.

The local housing authority remains legally responsible for any acts or omissions of the contractor and for decisions made in its name.\(^{1}\)

\(^{1}\) See 21.2.

\section*{CHAP\textup{\textsection}TER 21 of this book deals more fully with both contracting out and stock transfer. The report \textit{Housing allocation, homelessness and stock transfer: A guide to key issues} contains advice for private registered providers, registered social landlords and local housing authorities on all three subjects – stock transfer, contracting-out and housing allocation nominations – in a single publication, but this must now be read with some caution as it has not been revised since 2005.\(^{1}\)

COMPLAINTS, APPEALS AND LEGAL CHALLENGES

Before deciding whether or how to dispute a decision made on an application for (or nomination for) a housing allocation by a private registered provider or registered social landlord, an applicant should first obtain such details as he or she can about the particular private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s housing allocation scheme.\(^{1}\) At the same time, he or she should ask the private registered provider or registered social landlord to provide the details of the particulars which he or she has given to the local housing authority about ‘himself and his family’\(^{2}\) and which the private registered provider or registered social landlord has recorded as being relevant to the application for accommodation. The applicant has the statutory right to have that information made available on request at all reasonable times and without charge.\(^{3}\) Complying with the request will require disclosure of not only the application form but also of any details the private registered provider or registered social landlord has subsequently obtained in its consideration of the application. Most simply, the applicant can ask for and will usually be provided with a copy of the application file. Armed with the file and the copy scheme, the applicant (or an adviser) will usually be able to identify, and draw to the private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s attention, any simple error, missing material or other mishap that has occurred in considering the application.

In case any difficulty is not so easily resolved, every private registered provider or registered social landlord is required to have a complaints procedure. The Housing Ombudsman Service publishes a useful leaflet for complainants pursuing a complaint to a private registered provider in England under its complaints procedure: \textit{Making a complaint}.\(^{1}\) The regulatory guidance in England requires that:

‘Providers shall offer a range of ways for tenants to express a complaint and set out clear service standards for responding to complaints, including complaints about performance against the standards, and details of what to do if they are unhappy with the outcome of a complaint. Providers shall inform tenants how they use complaints to improve their services. Registered providers shall publish information about complaints each year, including their number and nature, and the outcome of the complaints. Providers shall accept complaints made by advocates authorised to act on a tenant's/tenants' behalf.¹

6.71 If the complaints procedure does not resolve the matter, an applicant with a continuing grievance concerning a private registered provider operating in England can press the complaint to the Housing Ombudsman service. The Ombudsman is established by statute and provides a free and independent service. Private registered providers are expected to comply with his recommendations. Information about how a complaint can be made is available on the Housing Ombudsman’s website. The Localism Act 2011 modified other arrangements for complaints to the Housing Ombudsman in England with effect from April 2013 but complaints relating to allocation decisions of private registered providers are still within his jurisdiction.

1 HA 1996, s 51 and Sch 2.

6.72 Complaints about registered social landlords operating in Wales can be directed to the Public Services Ombudsman for Wales.¹ A Housing Allocation Factsheet is available on his website².

¹ See further, 2.117–2.120.

6.73 Particular difficulties face applicants who have been nominated by a local housing authority but whose applications have been rejected by the private registered provider or registered social landlord to whom the nominations were made. In theory, they may need to pursue the matter with both the local housing authority and the housing provider. The reality is that most simply give up. Research conducted in England did not find a single case of an applicant exercising their right to a review of a HA 1996, Pt 6 allocation decision where a nomination had been rejected and the researcher commented that¹:

‘Put simply, applicants disappeared from the process. The issue was regarded as being between the RSL and the local authority. Most usually, the applicant themselves did not appreciate that they had even been the subject of a nomination. Their applications might have been considered by the RSL, they might even have been interviewed by the RSL, but they were unlikely to know that they were the subject of a nomination let alone a problematic one.’

6.74 However, one determined applicant did obtain relief from the Local Government Ombudsman¹ in a failed nomination case². The applicant was a homeowner. He wished to move nearer to a school which was able to meet the needs of his disabled child. He applied for accommodation under the local housing authority’s choice-based allocation scheme, was allocated priority Band B, and was able to bid under the scheme. In response to a successful bid, the local housing authority nominated him for a housing association property which suited his needs and he agreed to take it. However, the association operated an additional letting criterion - it would not let to an applicant who was a property owner. No such criteria appeared in the local housing authority’s allocation scheme. The association refused to rent the property to the complainant. The local housing authority accepted the association’s position. When the complainant sought a review, the local housing authority said that it could not hold a review because the decision had been made under the association’s policy. When the matter was raised with the Local Government Ombudsman, both the local housing authority and the association agreed that they had acted wrongly. The Ombudsman found maladministration because the local housing authority had lacked a clear understanding of its arrangements for nominations and consequent housing association letting and had simply accepted the association’s withdrawal of the tenancy. The refusal of a review had compounded those errors. Recommendations made included £3,800 compensation, a direct let and a review of both staff training and the content of nomination agreements made with local housing associations.

6.75 That example was followed by another successful complaint, to the Public Services Ombudsman for Wales, arising from a failed nomination1. A stock-transfer housing association (TCC) entered into a partnership agreement with the local housing authority under which all its housing stock was to be let in accordance with the local housing authority’s housing allocation scheme. An applicant under the scheme was a previous tenant of TCC, which considered that she owed it a former tenant debt. The local housing authority nominated her to TCC. Three TCC properties became available for which the applicant was the highest qualified under the scheme but she was bypassed for an offer by TCC because of her alleged debt. The Ombudsman found that TCC had taken matters into its own hands in ‘complete disregard for the partnership agreement . . . the law and government guidance and all good practice’ (para 36). However, TCC considered that other partners in the common housing register had similarly departed from the partnership agreement and circulated the draft embargoed PSOW report to other registered social landlords, which then wrote to the Ombudsman. The PSOW considered that this conduct demonstrated that there may be wider problems with stock transfer landlords in Wales and referred his report to the Welsh Government. The PSOW recommended an apology and £1,000 compensation for the complainant.

6.76 In Northern Ireland, a failed nomination applicant has succeeded in an application for judicial review of the relevant housing association2. He had applied for social housing accommodation under the allocation scheme adopted by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive (NIHE). He was awarded 330 points. This was the highest points score of any applicant for two-bedroom accommodation in the area where he wished to live. A local housing association had a development of two-bedroom units in that area and it had agreed to allocate its housing accommodation in keeping with the rules of the published NIHE allocation scheme. However, the association decided that it should let the new units only to transfer cases, rather than to new applicants such as Mr Turley. The properties were then allocated to tenants with fewer points than he had. One was a board member of the association who had 112 points, another was a management transfer applicant with 90 points and the third was the niece of a board member, who was not a transfer applicant, and had only 34 points. Horner J held that the allocation decisions were unlawful. They had not been made fairly because the two board members ought to have declared their interests in the lettings and taken no part in the relevant decision-making. The decision to let only to transfer applicants had not accorded with the rules of the scheme. The association had failed to consider the application made by Mr Turley alongside the others and had fettered its discretion in deciding only to consider transfer applicants. The failure to deal with the claimant fairly had also been in breach of his legitimate expectation and of the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Art 8.

6.77 Although a private registered provider or registered social landlord may operate a system of complaints handling, reviews of decisions or even appeals, there is strictly no right of appeal to the courts or tribunals from any decision of a private registered provider or registered social landlord or of the Ombudsmen.

6.78 The Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal have held that the decision of a private registered provider or registered social landlord in relation to the allocation of social housing can be amenable to judicial review – at least to the extent that, in allocating its housing, the private registered provider or registered social landlord might be described as undertaking a ‘public function’. The housing association involved in that case was refused permission to appeal to the Supreme Court. Therefore, unless and until – in some other case – the Supreme Court overrules the decision of the Court of Appeal, a dissatisfied applicant is now able to invoke the jurisdiction of the Administrative Court to review a private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s decision-making on a housing allocation application (whether the applicant was seeking a transfer, was a direct applicant, was a nominee from a local housing authority, or was simply a tenant of that social landlord seeking a mutual exchange). The grounds on which the court will interfere with such a decision are narrowly drawn and are described later in this book.

5 See Chapter 19.

6.79 The Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal have also decided that the act of a private registered provider or registered social landlord in granting or terminating a tenancy of social housing is, where it is done pursuant to a function of a public nature, an act to which the requirements of the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998) apply. HRA 1998 prohibits a public authority from acting in a manner contrary to an individual’s Convention rights as set out in those articles reproduced in HRA 1998, Sch 1. Although no Convention right gives an applicant a right to a home from a private registered provider or registered social landlord, the Convention rights might assist an applicant who has been denied a proper hearing of an application or an appeal by such a landlord (Art 6), who has been denied a transfer and thus is left in an unsatisfactory home let by a private registered provider or registered social landlord (Art 8) or who has been a victim of discrimination in consideration of his or her application (Art 14). Obviously, an applicant seeking to conduct a judicial review or to assert his or her Convention rights against a private registered provider or registered social landlord should be referred for specialist legal advice.

2 HRA 1998, s 6(1). For an example of a successful claim for breach of Art 14 in a housing allocation context see R (HA) v Ealing London Borough Council (No 1) [2015] EWHC 2375 (Admin), [2016] PTSR 16, Admin Ct.

3 See further Chapter 4 at 4.237–4.240. For an example of a successful discrimination claim in a housing allocation context see R (HA) v Ealing London Borough Council (No 1) [2015] EWHC 2375 (Admin), [2017] PTSR 16, Admin Ct.

6.80 Additionally, where the applicant considers that there has been unlawful discrimination or an infringement of human rights, the assistance of the Equality and Human Rights Commission can be sought.

1 See further Chapter 4 at 4.210 et seq.

6.81 It is theoretically possible for individual complaints to be made to the national regulatory authorities about allocation decisions made by private registered providers or registered social landlords but in practice they will be diverted to the private registered provider’s or registered social landlord’s complaints procedure or to the relevant Ombudsman. However, where the individual complaint reflects a systemic malfunction by the private registered provider or registered social landlord it may be worthwhile seeking to involve the regulator.

INTRODUCTION

7.1 This chapter and the following chapters of this book deal with ‘Homelessness’. Like the statutory schemes for the homeless in the Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996), Pt 7, for local housing authorities in England, and the Housing
7.1 Local Housing Authorities’ Homelessness Reviews

(Wales) Act 2014 (H(W)A 2014), Pt 2, for local housing authorities in Wales, this book’s primary focus is on the individual applicant for assistance and the powers and duties of a local housing authority in dealing with the application. However, over recent years, increasing attention has been focused on the need to take a more strategic approach to the problem of homelessness beyond simply operating the safety net mechanism for individual applicants now contained in the HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

1 As amended by Homelessness Reduction Act 2017, (HRA 2017), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

7.2 The steady rise, between 2001 and 2004, in the number of applications for homelessness assistance in all parts of the UK, and the consequent growth in the numbers of households in temporary accommodation, caused the focus of attention to shift towards methods of preventing homelessness and to dealing more effectively with it when it does arise. Central government began encouraging a more proactive rather than reactive approach to the issue of homelessness.

7.3 After 2004, the number of applications for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in England and Wales fell steadily until 2010. The fall has been attributed to various factors including the former Labour government’s policy of encouraging local housing authorities in England to halve their use of temporary accommodation by the year 2010. Critics observed that another reason might be that the laudable policy of taking action to prevent homelessness in practice became ‘gate-keeping’, in that potential applicants for homelessness assistance were dissuaded from making applications.

7.4 From mid 2010, as the recession began to impact, the number of applications for homelessness assistance increased in both England and Wales. In England, the number of acceptances (applicants who were owed the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty) in the second quarter of 2017 was 53% higher than the numbers in the last quarter of 2009. In Wales, there was a smaller, but still significant, increase. Commentators noted that the figures of acceptances of applications for homelessness assistance could not provide a true picture of the extent of homelessness for two reasons. The first was that only applicants who are eligible for assistance, have a priority need and have not become homeless intentionally are accepted, so most single homeless adults are not included in the figures. The second was that local housing authorities were increasingly using a prevention and housing options approach, rather than assisting applicants to make an application for homelessness assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

2 The last quarter of 2009 saw the lowest number of acceptances of applications for homelessness assistance: 9,430. The number of acceptances in the second quarter of 2017 was 14,400: Statutory Homelessness and prevention and relief, April to June (Q1) 2017: England

(DCLG, 28 September 2017). Strangely, the number of acceptances in the second quarter of 2017 was considerably lower than the number in the first quarter of 2017, which was 28,430. It is not possible to compare directly the figures of acceptances by local housing authorities in Wales in 2010 and 2017, because of the impact of the Housing (Wales) Act 2014 (H(W)A 2014), Pt 2, see Chapter 16.

7.5 The housing charity and campaigning organization Shelter, in a review of housing conditions since its inception in 1966, highlights those people who are “hidden homeless”: sofa surfing between friends or relatives, or living in unsuitable accommodation. It is not possible to ascertain how many people are living in these conditions. In addition to the hidden homeless, 250,000 people are known to be homeless in the UK at any one time, and at least 3,500 people are known to sleep rough on any given night1. Shelter concludes that radical action is necessary.

1 The Green Book Report: 50 years on (Shelter 2016).

7.6 In August 2017, the homelessness charity Crisis published Homelessness Projections, which considered what the level of homelessness might be in the future. Crisis reported that all forms of core homelessness had increased over the previous five years and that if government policies remained unchanged, the most acute forms of homelessness were likely to keep rising. Crisis predicted an increase in rough sleeping of 76% over the next ten years. Shelter has calculated that at any one time, there are 307,000 recorded as homeless, which equates to one in 200 people across the UK as a whole2.

1 Homelessness Projections: Core homelessness in Great Britain (Bramley, Crisis, 2017)

2 Far from Home: Homelessness in Britain in 2017 (Shelter, November 2017). Shelter’s analysis is based on figures for people sleeping rough, single people in hostels, households owed a duty under HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, and homeless household accommodated by social services obtained through freedom of information requests.

7.7 The governments in both England and Wales responded to these increases by encouraging greater use of the private rented sector. In England, the 2010–15 UK Coalition Government introduced the Localism Act 2011, ss 148–149, which permits local housing authorities in England to bring the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty to an end by making an applicant a private rented sector offer1. In Wales, the National Assembly for Wales passed H(W)A 2014, Pt 22, which gives local housing authorities in Wales the power to make private rented sector offers1. In addition, H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, aims to help a much larger number of homeless people. It concentrates on prevention and helping applicants to stay in their existing homes, or to find new ones, without needing local housing authority accommodation, where possible1.

7.8 In 2016, Crisis worked with Bob Blackman MP to put forward a Homelessness Reduction Bill as a Private Members’ Bill. The Bill received Government and indeed all-party support and was enacted as the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017). It applies to local housing authorities in England and has come into effect substantially in April 2018. It is modeled on the Welsh approach, in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, of early intervention, prevention and helping applicants to secure their own accommodation. All applicants who are eligible, and either homeless or threatened with homelessness, are to be helped. The issues of whether an applicant has a priority need and/or has become homeless intentionally only become relevant in relation to the provision of accommodation. We discuss the potential impact of the amendments to HA 1996, Pt 7, by HRA 2017, in Chapters 15 and 16 of this book.

Royal Assent 27 April 2017. In force for the power of the Secretary of State to make regulations 27 April 2017 (HRA s 13). Remainder to be brought into force by statutory instrument (HRA s 13(3)).

A number of organisations had reported concerns at the lack of help and support available to homeless people who do not have any priority need: see Support for single homeless people in England: Annual Review 2016 (Homeless Link, 2016); Stop the scandal: an investigation into mental health and rough sleeping (St Mungos, February 2016); It’s no life at all: and Rough Sleepers’ experiences of violence and abuse on the streets of England and Wales (Sanders & Albanese, Crisis, December 2016). After HRA 2017 had received Royal Assent, but before its coming into force, the All-Party Parliamentary Group for Ending Homelessness published its findings into support available for particular vulnerable groups: Homelessness Prevention for care leavers, prison leavers, and survivors of domestic violence (July 2017). In October 2017, Crisis published Moving on: Improving access to housing for single homeless people in England (Crisis, October 2017) which recommended that the government should take urgent steps to ensure that there is a supply of affordable housing available to single people who are homeless.

Both HA 1996, Pt 7; for local housing authorities in England, and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, for local housing authorities in Wales, require local housing authorities to take a strategic and corporate approach to tackling homelessness.

As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

7.10 This chapter reviews the consequences of this strategic approach. It considers, in turn, the development of ‘homelessness strategies’ at national, regional and local level. Most of the focus is upon the latter, particularly as a result of statutory duties imposed on local housing authorities to draw up their own local homelessness strategies. Those duties are considered in particular detail.

NATIONAL STRATEGIES

7.11 At national level, policy-making relating to homelessness is undertaken by central government for England, and by the devolved governments of Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland\(^1\). The UK Government has no single national strategy directed towards the prevention of homelessness or to tackling homelessness when it arises.

7.12 In the absence of a UK-wide strategy, we consider each of the four national policies on homelessness in turn.

England

A review of recent history

1997–2010 LABOUR GOVERNMENTS

7.13 In 2001, the former Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions (DTLR) consulted on the development of a National Homelessness Strategy for England, but no national strategy emerged from that exercise\(^1\). Then, between July 2004 and January 2005, the Parliamentary Select Committee on the work of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (ODPM)\(^2\) carried out an Inquiry into the effectiveness of implementation of the Homelessness Act 2002\(^3\).

\(^1\) A national homelessness strategy: an invitation to comment (DTLR, 21 September 2001).

\(^2\) Now the Communities and Local Government Parliamentary Select Committee. The ODPM was the relevant government department with responsibility for housing policy at the time.

\(^3\) Select Committee on Office of the Deputy Prime Minister ‘Housing, Planning, Local Government and the Regions, Third report of session 2004–2005’.

7.14 In January 2005, the ODPM published a five-year national housing strategy, Sustainable Communities: Homes for All\(^4\), and then followed it, in March 2005, with a strategy for tackling homelessness, Sustainable Communities: settled homes; changing lives\(^5\). A Housing Green Paper Homes for the Future: more affordable, more sustainable was published in July 2007\(^6\). The most ambitious aim was to halve the number of households living in temporary accommodation between 2005 and 2010. Increased emphasis on prevention was seen as the key to achieving this. This was reflected in the guidance contained in chapters 1–5 of the 2006–2018 Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities, published in July 2006\(^7\). Another priority was reducing youth homelessness, and a commitment to end the use of bed and breakfast accommodation for 16- and 17-year-olds by 2010. The numbers of households in temporary accommodation did indeed fall between 2005 and 2010, so that by December 2010 the policy aim had been achieved. However, the figures started to rise again from mid-2011, as applications for homelessness assistance increased

2010–15 Coalition Government

7.15 Shortly after the UK Coalition Government assumed office in May 2010, the Minister for Housing announced the formation of a cross-government Ministerial Working Group on homelessness. The Minister also changed the methodology used by local housing authorities to count the numbers of people sleeping rough

2. DCLG, 2011.

7.16 In November 2011, the UK Coalition Government published Laying the Foundations: a Housing Strategy for England. In relation to homelessness duties owed under HA 1996, Pt 7, the Government’s policy was enacted in the Localism Act 2011, permitting local housing authorities to bring the main housing duty to an end with offers of suitable private rented sector accommodation

3. Chapter 6, para 6 of Laying the Foundations.

7.17 In August 2012, the then Department for Communities and Local Government (DCLG) published Making every contact count, a joint approach to preventing homelessness, the second publication of the Ministerial Working Group on Homelessness. In March 2015, the Ministerial Working Group published Addressing complex needs: improving services for vulnerable homeless people. It advises local housing authorities to commission, rather than provide, services for homeless people who have complex needs, and to work with other statutory and voluntary agencies to try to meet those needs.

1. DCLG, 2012.
2. DCLG, March 2015.
7.18 As already noted\(^1\), the Homelessness Reduction Bill 2016, introduced as a Private Members’ Bill, received government and cross-Party support and was enacted as HRA 2017, receiving Royal Assent on 27 April 2017. HRA 2017 responds to concerns that the duties and powers to assist the homeless at HA 1996, Pt 7, are not available to all homeless people. Mirroring H(W)A 2014, Pt 2\(^2\), it introduces new duties to help all eligible applicants\(^3\) prevent their imminent homelessness\(^4\) (for those who are threatened with homelessness)\(^5\) and to help all eligible applicants secure their own accommodation\(^6\) (for those who are homeless)\(^7\). The issues of whether an applicant has a priority need\(^8\) and/or whether he or she has become homeless intentionally\(^9\) only arise in relation to whether the local housing authority has any duty to secure accommodation for the applicant. This model envisages increased use of the private rented sector so that local housing authorities work with private landlords, and refer applicants, rather than secure accommodation from their own stock. The scheme envisages early intervention, during a two month period when an applicant is threatened with homelessness. The days when local housing authorities would refuse to assist until an applicant was at crisis point should become a thing of the past\(^10\).

7.19 In anticipation of the changes required by the amendments to HA 1996, Pt 7, inserted by HRA 2017, the government announced a Homelessness Support Grant to local housing authorities in England, paid for two years from April 2017. Campaigners and local government organisations have voiced fears that the money will not be sufficient and that additional money is required beyond the two year period. The government consulted on a draft Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities\(^1\) between October and December 2017. The final Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities (the English Code) was published in February 2018\(^2\) and amended in June 2018.

7.20 As already noted\(^1\), the English government’s progress in tackling homelessness has been subject to criticism by Crisis which, from 2011, has been publishing an annual report. The most recent publication at the date of writing is The Homelessness Monitor: England 2018. It notes an ongoing upward trend in officially estimated rough sleeper numbers by 169%, and an increase in acceptances of applications for homelessness assistance by 34% since the low point in 2009/2010. The authors estimate that the third category of homeless people, the ‘hidden homeless’ living in insecure and concealed households, could compromise 3.38 million adults. The vast bulk of the recorded increases are from people who have been made homeless from the private rented sector and thus the driving force behind the increase in homelessness is poverty. The authors also note that welfare cuts (including the shared accommodation rate, the benefit cap and universal credit) are likely to increase the numbers of people who are homeless. They comment that the increase in rough sleeping numbers, and the attention paid to households living in temporary accommodation particularly bed and breakfast accommodation, has driven the issue of homeless up the political agenda. They note cross-Party and cross-sector support for HRA 2017 and also high-profile political commitments to address homelessness from government, and from elected Mayors in London, Greater Manchester, Liverpool and the West Midlands. They doubt that the government’s current targets for house-building will be met, or that those houses will be sufficient to resolve the crisis of homelessness. They describe as unprecedented ‘the profile and energy now being given to homelessness as an acknowledged “national crisis”’, which they welcome.

7.21 It remains to be seen whether local housing authorities in England will have access to sufficient supplies of affordable, suitable accommodation, including private rented sector accommodation, to be able to fulfil their new duties to help applicants prevent their own homelessness and to help applicants secure their own accommodation.

7.22 There is no statutory obligation on any local housing authority in England to have regard to the government’s national housing or homelessness strategies, either in formulating its own homelessness strategy or when it comes to the performance of its homelessness functions. However, local housing authorities should ordinarily take national government policy into account.

Wales

7.23 When the National Assembly for Wales was formed in 1999, it was given competence to make secondary legislation in the areas of housing and homelessness, but not primary legislation. Those functions were passed to the Welsh Assembly Government in 2006, which became the Welsh Government in 2011. Following a referendum in March 2011, the National Assembly of Wales acquired the right to pass primary legislation in the areas of housing and homelessness. The Assembly exercised this power when it passed the H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, which created a new statutory structure for homelessness in Wales.

7.24 Upon formation, the National Assembly for Wales made a commitment to set up a Homelessness Commission to advise it on how it should be tackling homelessness in Wales. Following the Commission’s report, the Welsh Assembly Government published the 2003 National Homelessness Strategy, based on an overall strategic national housing policy document, Better Homes for People in Wales – National Housing Strategy for Wales.

1 Report to the Welsh Assembly Government, Tackling Homelessness – Key issues for consideration by Welsh Local Authorities (Tarki Technology Ltd, June 2005).

7.26 In February 2006, the Public Services Ombudsman for Wales published an account of practices by local housing authorities in Wales: Housing Allocations and Homelessness: A Special Report by the Local Government Ombudsman for Wales. The Ombudsman summarised his findings:

‘A significant number of the 22 Welsh local authorities have failed to introduce housing allocation and homelessness policies and procedures that implement in practice the relevant legislative requirements.’

1 Public Services Ombudsman for Wales, 2006.

7.27 The current national strategy – Ten Year Homelessness Plan for Wales 2009–2019 – was published by the Welsh Assembly Government in July 2009. This was more ambitious and far-reaching than the previous plans and demonstrated considerable autonomy from the UK Government.

7.28 The Ten Year Homelessness Plan for Wales 2009–2019 aims to reduce homelessness ‘to a minimum’ by 2019 and to eliminate rough sleeping altogether. It will achieve those goals by preventing homelessness wherever possible, and working across organisational and policy boundaries. The Plan requires prevention services to recognise ‘the need for a holistic approach to break cycles of homelessness’, so that housing advice services should be providing not only advice on homelessness, and on sustaining existing homes, but also referrals for employment, training, education, help with financial problems and debt, and health advice. The needs of veterans, young homeless people, care-leavers, former prisoners, those fleeing domestic abuse, asylum seekers and refugees are specifically addressed, as is rural homelessness.

7.29 The Plan concluded that the statutory framework in place at the time (HA 1996, Pt 7) ‘does not allow everyone to receive the level of service that they need to ensure that their housing needs can be met’. ‘[K]ey areas of homelessness legislation and the duties placed on Local Authorities, especially around the area of priority need, intentionality, local connection and the discharge of duty into the private rented sector’ were to be revised. The aim of the review was to achieve a situation where ‘everyone can have access to the help that they need, to secure a home that meets their needs and provides a platform from which to address their aspirations’.

7.30 In May 2012, the Welsh Government published Homes for Wales: A White Paper for Better Lives and Communities1, a consultation on proposals for new legislation and for other action. Attached to the White Paper was a research report: Impact analysis of existing homelessness legislation in Wales2. The report found strong concerns about how HA 1996, Pt 7 was interpreted and applied differently across Wales, particularly in relation to homelessness prevention, and application of the tests for determining priority need and whether applicants might have become homeless intentionally.

1 Welsh Government, May 2012.
2 January 2012, Cardiff University and others.

7.31 The White Paper proposed a ‘long-term vision’ of ‘ending family homelessness by 2019’1. It sought to achieve a more flexible housing system, where people can move between social housing, private rented accommodation and home ownership, to suit their needs at different times of their lives. Beyond 2019, the Welsh Government wanted to see a future where ‘homelessness does not exist’. It will achieve that by building more homes, bringing empty homes and other empty properties back into use, and improving the quality of existing homes. One chapter deals with prevention of homelessness2.

1 Introduction to the White Paper.
2 Chapter 8 of the White Paper.

7.32 The plans for legislation contained in the White Paper were then brought forward in the Housing (Wales) Bill. The Bill was debated by the National Assembly in 2013–14 and received Royal Assent on 17 September 2014. H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, came into effect on 27 April 2015 and applies to all applications for help made to local housing authorities in Wales on or after that date1.

Authorities on the Allocation of Accommodation and Homelessness was published on 28 April 2015¹. A revised Code of Guidance for Local Authorities on the Allocation of Accommodation and Homelessness (the Welsh Code) was published on 24 March 2016². The Welsh Code noted and endorsed³ the recommendations from Shelter Cymru on good practice for service users in homelessness services: Equal Ground Standard a guide to the service user standard for Welsh homelessness services⁴.

3 Welsh Code, para 5.41.
4 Shelter Cymru, January 2015.

7.34 The provisions of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, emphasise the prevention of homelessness and the role of local housing authorities in helping applicants to secure accommodation for themselves. As well as providing accommodation as a safety-net for applicants who are homeless, eligible for help, have a priority need and, in some cases, have not become homeless intentionally⁵. Local housing authorities can make greater use of the private rented sector in order to perform their duties under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. The Welsh Government’s intention is that the test of ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ should be gradually phased out. H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, seeks to achieve this by:

- requiring local housing authorities in Wales, from 1 July 2015, to opt into using the ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ test; and
- containing a provision, which will not come into force until 2019, whereby the duty to accommodate applicants with priority need will include applicants who have become homeless intentionally if they have children or young people in their household⁶.

2 H(W)A 2014, s 78, see 17.17–17.23.

7.35 There have been three evaluations of the implementation of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, since it was brought into force in April 2015. In 2016, Shelter Cymru published Reasonable Steps: Experiences of Homelessness Services under Housing (Wales) Act 2014⁷. The report had interviewed 50 service-users on how they felt they were treated when they approached local housing authorities as homeless. Generally, there was clear evidence of good practice, although the report commented that sometimes the response left people feeling that they had not been offered adequate levels of support. Some people had told to remain in their homes despite having received valid notices to quit. The report noted that use of the private rented sector was very much ‘front and centre’, there was some pro-active help providing including assisting people making their own searches for accommodation and financial help was often offered. Other interventions, such as advice on finances or benefits, or mediation, were under-used. Overall, some people had been effectively helped and some felt brushed aside. There was not, as yet, a culture of assessing housing needs in the round.

7.36 Local Housing Authorities’ Homelessness Reviews

7.36 In 2017, the Welsh Government published an interim post-implementation evaluation of the homelessness legislation (Pt 2 of the Housing (Wales) Act 2014)\(^1\). The evaluation drew on the experiences of local housing authorities and various ‘stakeholder’ organisations, along with interviews with service-users. Local housing authorities and stakeholders were overwhelmingly positive about the introduction of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, and the new services provided. Their figures suggested that the preventative approach was working. Service-users were broadly positive about the help that they had received but some were concerned about lack of support. The main prevention activity was financial assistance in the form of rent guarantees, payments of deposits or bonds or help to reduce rent arrears. It was found that a larger number of people had been helped to prevent their own homelessness than before the implementation of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

\(^1\) Welsh Government, August 2017.

7.37 The most recent Homelessness Monitor was published by Crisis in 2017: The Homelessness Monitor: Wales 2017\(^1\). In general, its findings were positive. It reported that there was an overwhelming consensus that the new framework in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, had had an array of positive impacts, including re-orientating the culture of local housing authorities towards a more preventative, person-centred and outcome-focused approach, and providing a much better service for single homeless people in particular. The numbers of household accommodated under the H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty\(^2\), was much lower than under the previous HA 1996, Pt 7, framework. However, there was still a substantial cohort of applicants for homelessness assistance for whom local housing authority offers of assistance had not succeeded in finding a solution to their housing crisis. The largest group in this cohort of applicants were those who had been assessed as not having a priority need and so were not eligible for the (W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty\(^3\), after the H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty\(^4\) had come to an end. There was also concern at the numbers of applicants who had been found not to have co-operated and so had fallen out of the system\(^5\). In April 2018, the Welsh Assembly’s Equality, Local Government and Communities Committee published a report noting that the numbers of people sleeping rough had increased and calling for the Welsh Government to consider abolishing priority need altogether, failing which it should extend the categories of priority need to include prison leavers and widen the definition of ‘vulnerable’\(^6\).

7.38 The Welsh Government published statistics on applications for homelessness assistance between April 2016 to March 2017 on 27 July 2017\(^1\). 9,210 applicants had been assessed as threatened with homelessness and 62% of those had been helped to prevent their homelessness. 10,884 applicants had been assessed as homeless and eligible for help, and owed the H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty. 41% of those had been helped to secure accommodation and had their homelessness successfully relieved. 2,076 applicants had been assessed as homeless, eligible for help, having a priority need and having not become homeless intentionally and owed the H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty. Of those, 81% accepted an offer of suitable accommodation. Between 5–6% of applicants had been notified of a decision that they had not co-operated and that the relevant duty had come to an end, as Crisis had noted.

7.39 Local housing authorities in Wales should take into account both the Ten Year Homelessness Plan, and the Welsh Code, when formulating their own homelessness strategies. The homelessness strategies should be part of each local housing authority’s local planning framework, particularly the Well-being Plan. Each local housing authority’s homelessness strategy should reflect a corporate approach, involving other departments of the local housing authority and external organisations.

Northern Ireland

7.40 Since the restoration of the Northern Ireland Executive in May 2007, policy on housing, including homelessness, has been the responsibility of the Department for Social Development. Statutory responsibility for dealing with homeless people lies with the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. Supervision is conducted by the Northern Ireland Audit Office.

7.41 In July 2007 and after a three-year consultation period, the Department for Social Development published Including the Homeless, a Strategy to promote the social inclusion of homeless people, and those at risk of becoming homeless, in Northern Ireland.

1 Department for Social Development, July 2007.

7.42 Housing (Amendment) Act (Northern Ireland) 2010, s 1, placed a statutory duty on the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to develop and publish a 5-year homelessness strategy. In 2011, the Housing Executive consulted on a draft Homelessness Strategy 2011–2016. It then published its Homelessness Strategy for Northern Ireland 2012–2017 in April 2012. This contained similarly ambitious targets to those of the Welsh Government or Scottish Executive: to eliminate long term homelessness and rough sleeping.

7.43 Between December 2016 and February 2017, the Northern Ireland Housing Executive consulted on a new draft Homelessness Strategy. It then adopted published a new strategy: Ending Homelessness Together: Homelessness Strategy for Northern Ireland 2017–2022 in April 2017. As the title suggests, its vision is of ‘ending homelessness together’ which it aims to do by helping people prevent their own homelessness, supporting households who are homeless to find suitable accommodation as quickly as possible, and working across departments. Like all the other jurisdictions in the United Kingdom, the emphasis is on early intervention and prevention. The new Strategy contains an evaluation of the 2012–2017 Strategy and finds that, whilst there had been some positive developments, progress in delivering the strategy had not always been rapid. That was particularly true in the case of developing prevention services. More housing advice was recommended and the lack of affordable housing across Northern Ireland highlighted. The new Strategy recommends more work on understanding the causes of rough sleeping and chronic homelessness and use of the Housing First model.

1 Housing Executive.
2 ‘Housing First’ is a new approach towards supporting homeless people with high and complex needs, which aim to help those people find an independent tenancy as quickly as possible and then provide the support needed in order to sustain the tenancy. It has been piloted in Northern Ireland, Liverpool and elsewhere. See Housing First Feasibility Study for the Liverpool City Region (Blood, Copeman, Goldup, Place, Bretheron & Dulson, Crisis, 2017).

7.44 In 2016, Crisis published The Homelessness Monitor: Northern Ireland 2016. It finds that the levels of homelessness in Northern Ireland has been at historically high levels since 2005 and continue to rise. Acceptances were higher than in the other jurisdictions, which the authors attribute to Northern Ireland having, yet, at that time, to move to a prevention model. A large proportion of applicants are discharged into social housing, and this is likely to change when the 2017–2022 Strategy is implemented. There has been controversy over rough sleeping, following six deaths, although the levels are low in comparison with other jurisdictions. The implementation of the 2012–2017 Strategy is described as ‘disappointing’. They note a decline in social lettings available, but an increase in the supply of private sector properties available for rent. There was concern at the impact of anticipated welfare reform measures, which had been implemented earlier in the rest of the United Kingdom but delayed in the case of Northern Ireland. The new Strategy, with a Housing First and prevention approach, was anticipated.

Scotland

7.45 At national policy level, homelessness in Scotland is the responsibility of the Scottish Executive. Soon after devolution in 1999, the Executive established a Homelessness Task Force charged with mapping out a programme to address the issue of homelessness in Scotland.

7.46 The initial report of the Task Force (in April 2000) led in due course to the amendment of the statutory homelessness scheme in Scotland, until then contained in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987, by the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001.

7.47 The final report of the Task Force in 2002, Homelessness: an action plan for prevention and effective response, set out a 12-year action programme to eliminate and thereafter prevent homelessness in Scotland. The subsequent Homelessness etc (Scotland) Act 2003 contained radical statutory measures designed to implement the Task Force recommendations. It included an ambitious target to abolish the priority need test by 2012, so that everyone who had not become homeless intentionally would be entitled to a permanent home. This ambition was realised in the Homelessness (Abolition of Priority Need) Test) (Scotland) Order 2012, which came into effect on 31 December 2012. From that date, the priority need test has been abolished in Scotland.

7.49 As the titles of the first and third additions to the Code of Guidance suggest, the Scottish Executive has adopted the prevention and housing options agenda. Five regional Housing Options Hubs, designed to co-ordinate and develop policy and practice were established in 2010. The Scottish Housing Regulator published a fairly critical report on housing options practice in 2014, recommending greater clarity and guidance and also noting that the diversion of people from a homelessness assessment to housing options approach was not always appropriate.

7.50 It would have been expected that the abolition of the priority need test in 2012 would lead to a corresponding increase in the numbers of applications for homelessness assistance, and in the numbers of applications accepted. However, the statistics show a significant drop in applications for homelessness assistance since 2010. The drop is attributed, by both the Scottish Executive and by commentators, to the use of prevention and housing options. However, the authors of the Homelessness Monitor: Scotland 2015 argue that combining the numbers of applications for homelessness assistance with the numbers of people approaching housing options gives a truer picture of the level of homelessness and that the level has remained fairly steady since 2010\(^3\).

1. From nearly 60,000 in 2010, to 34,100 applications between 1 April 2016 and 31 March 2017 (Homelessness in Scotland 2016–2017, Scottish Executive, 2017).
3. See 7.53.

7.51 The statutory responsibility for providing homelessness services in Scotland falls upon the Scottish local authorities. The Scottish Executive monitors Scottish local authorities by the publication of homelessness statistics based on returns from local authorities.

7.52 Scottish local authorities are required by Housing (Scotland) Act 2001 to publish local housing strategies\(^1\) and homelessness strategies\(^2\). The homelessness strategy must be based upon an assessment of homelessness in a local authority’s area. The Scottish Executive has published guidance to local authorities on formulating their housing strategy\(^3\). That guidance includes advice on the preparation of homelessness strategies\(^1\). The Executive’s Minister\(^5\) has power to reject local homelessness strategies submitted by those local authorities\(^6\).

7.53 The authors of The Homelessness Monitor: Scotland 2015\(^1\), noted the decrease in the number of applications for homelessness assistance. They commented that this is the result of the introduction of housing options model of homelessness prevention. However, when taking the number of approaches to housing options into account, they conclude that the overall annual level of homelessness presentations in recent years has remained fairly steady, at around 54,000. Scottish local authorities make less use of the private rented sector than local housing authorities elsewhere in the UK and the authors note that “right to buy” was due to be abolished and that should prevent further losses to the social rented sector. They also noted, as they had done in other jurisdictions, the impact on expected levels of homelessness of cuts to welfare benefits.

REGIONAL STRATEGIES

7.54 In England, steps were taken towards the development of regional homelessness strategies. In 2003, Regional Housing Boards were established to develop strategic housing policy for the regions. That role passed to the eight Regional Assemblies in England, plus the Mayor of London, in September 2006. Except for the Greater London Assembly, Regional Assemblies in England were abolished between 2008 and March 2010, and replaced by Local Authorities’ Leaders Boards: voluntary associations of council leaders. Those Boards were abolished by the UK Coalition Government in 2010.

7.55 All of the Regional Assemblies had Regional Housing Strategies. The West Midlands Regional Assembly, the East of England Regional Assembly, the North West Regional Assembly and the East Midlands Regional Assembly also published Regional Homelessness Strategies.

London

7.56 In London, responsibility for housing and homelessness strategy was given to the Mayor in 2006. The London Boroughs retain the statutory responsibility for the delivery of homelessness services under HA 1996, Pt 7, and must also publish their own homelessness strategies and reviews.

7.57 The then Mayor of London, Ken Livingstone, published a draft housing strategy for London in 2007. His successor as Mayor of London, Boris Johnson, published the first statutory housing strategy for London in February 2010. In the foreword, the Mayor wrote:

‘Tackling homelessness and reducing overcrowding are two of my key priorities, with targets to end rough sleeping by 2012 and to halve severe overcrowding among social tenants by 2016.’

1 Mayor of London, February 2010.

7.58 From April 2012, the Mayor of London, with the Greater London Assembly, has been responsible for strategic housing policy in London. A new housing strategy was published in June 2014: Homes for London: the London housing strategy. The strategy emphasised the need for an increase in the supply of housing to meet London’s ‘affordability crisis’ and ‘rising housing costs’.

2 Mayor of London, June 2014.

7.59 The priority to end rough sleeping led to the launch of the London Delivery Board in 2009, tasked with tackling rough sleeping. The Board in turn piloted the No Second Night Out initiative in 2011 across ten London boroughs, expanding it to cover all of the London boroughs in June 2012. No Second Night Out aimed to identify people sleeping rough, and provide them with advice through hub facilities which are open 24 hours a day. The hubs make an assessment of each individual and then provide support, such as helping the individual find accommodation or helping him or her to return to a home area (other parts of the UK or abroad). The initiative has also been adopted by local housing authorities outside of London.

1 See 7.16.

7.60 The 2016–2020 Mayor of London, Sadiq Khan, established a Rough Sleeping Taskforce in 2016. The Taskforce adopted a No Nights Sleeping Rough plan. Various London local housing authorities and voluntary groups are represented and the aim is to identify interventions that will tackle rough sleeping in London and either implement those interventions, or lobby for their implementation. The focus is to prevent people from sleeping rough, and prevent those who are sleeping rough from becoming entrenched rough sleepers1.

7.61 The Mayor of London 2016–2020, Sadiq Khan, published a draft Housing Strategy for consultation in September 20171. ‘Helping tackle homelessness’ is one of the five priorities. He aims to achieve this by working with London Borough Councils, government and charities to support a greater focus on the prevention of homelessness, pressing government for adequate funding for local housing authorities to deliver the new duties required by HRA 2017, investing in more affordable homes, lobbying government to overturn cuts to welfare benefits (particularly those affecting youth people) and working to eliminate rough sleeping through the No Nights Sleeping Rough taskforce.

LOCAL HOMELESSNESS STRATEGIES AND REVIEWS

Overview

1 HA 2002, ss 1–4, see Annex 2.
2 For local housing authorities in Wales, the statutory duty is now at H(W)A 2014, ss 50–52.

7.63 Local housing authorities were required to publish their first local homelessness strategy within a year, ie by 2003. They are required to keep the local strategies under review, and modify them if necessary. At the very least, they must publish new strategies every five years1. So most local housing authorities in England, and all local housing authorities in Wales, were required to publish new homelessness strategies in 2008 and 2013. Local housing authorities in England are required to publish new homelessness strategies by July 2018.

1 HA 2002, s 1(3) and (4).

7.64 On 27 April 2015, the statutory obligation on local housing authorities in Wales to formulate, adopt and publish a homelessness strategy moved to H(W)A 2014, ss 50–52. New homelessness strategies are to be adopted in 2018 and every four years after that1.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 50(2).
Local homelessness strategies and reviews 7.70

7.65 The provisions of H(W)A 2014, ss 50–52, for local housing authorities in Wales, are very similar to those of HA 2002, ss 1–4 for local housing authorities in England. We note in this chapter where there are differences between the law in England and the law in Wales. At the end of each section – on homelessness reviews and on homelessness strategies – we provide a paragraph summarising any different legal obligations for local housing authorities in Wales.¹

7.66 The purpose of preparing a local strategy is to enable local housing authorities to have an accurate picture of the levels of homelessness in their district, and to set out the steps to be taken in order to tackle and prevent homelessness.

7.67 Of course, to devise an effective local strategy, the local housing authority must have access to the raw data on the extent of homelessness in its area and on the current prevention programmes and local initiatives to tackle it. HA 2002, and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, therefore, require every local housing authority to conduct a ‘review’ of such matters, in relation to its area, so that the design and content of the local strategy may be undertaken on the best possible information.¹

7.68 In short, the review is meant to paint the picture on homelessness locally and the strategy is intended to set out how the problem is to be addressed.

7.69 The fundamental objectives underlying the requirement both for a review and for a strategy are:

(1) identifying action that can be taken to prevent homelessness;
(2) providing suitable services and accommodation for people who are, or may become homeless; and
(3) supporting people who are homeless or potentially homeless and those who were formerly homeless and need support, to prevent them becoming homeless again.¹

¹ HA 2002, ss 2(2) and 3(1); H(W)A 2014, ss 51(1)(b) and 52(1).

7.70 HA 2002, H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 and the Codes of Guidance emphasise a multi-agency approach.¹ They require cooperation between local housing authorities and adult care and children’s services, and encourage consultation and joint working with other public authorities, voluntary organisations and individuals in the undertaking of the review and in the formulation of the strategy.²

7.71 The strategies, once produced, should not be filed away to gather dust. Both local housing authorities and the relevant adult care and children’s services authorities are required to take the contents of the local homelessness strategy into account when exercising other statutory functions, such as decisions on homelessness and allocation and the performance of duties owed to young people, families with children and other vulnerable people. As this chapter indicates, the requirement to have regard to them in day-to-day work will enable strategies to be used as legal tools, where appropriate.

1 HA 2002, s 1(5) and (6); H(W)A 2014, s 50(4).

7.72 There is no statutory timetable for the undertaking, production or publication of the initial homelessness review (or any subsequent reviews). In practice, many local housing authorities published both their initial review and initial strategy documents together or, indeed, incorporated the homelessness review into the first local homelessness strategy. Since the strategy must be based on the findings in the review, it follows that a review should always be carried out first.

7.73 Because the statutory requirement to prepare a homelessness strategy was entirely novel when brought into force in 2003, considerable resources were deployed to assist local housing authorities with the task of formulating their first strategies. The UK Government provided additional financial resources to assist local housing authorities in England in drawing up their local reviews and strategies. Substantial written guidance was provided to local housing authorities. This included: Homelessness Strategies: A Good Practice Handbook and Preventing tomorrow’s rough sleepers: A Good Practice Handbook, and they were in turn followed by publication of the Homelessness Codes of Guidance providing more assistance.

7.74 At local level, the individual reviews and strategies are expected to take into account other local authority and national government plans and strategies relevant to addressing the causes of homelessness. The strategies adopted by local housing authorities in England must also take into account the local housing authority’s own allocation scheme and tenancy strategy. London borough councils must take into account the current London housing strategy. Joint working with adult care and children’s services departments or authorities (in the case of non-unitary authorities) is a statutory requirement, and local housing authorities are encouraged to involve other public authorities, such as health authorities, the police, private registered providers or registered social landlords and private landlords, voluntary organisations and other organisations and individuals.

5 English Code, paras 2.4–2.9; for local housing authorities in Wales, joint working is provided for at H(W)A 2014, s 52(3) and (6) and Welsh Code, chapter 6.

7.75 By the end of 2003, every local housing authority in England and Wales had complied with the duty to conduct a review and had adopted and published a strategy, and most local housing authorities had repeated that exercise in 2008. Copies of those strategies are relatively easy to obtain. Local housing authorities generally post their reviews and strategies on their websites. Hard copies of local reviews and strategies are available from individual local housing authorities on request.

1 Local housing authorities in Wales are required to publish the homelessness review and strategy on their website, if they have one: H(W)A 2014, ss 51(2)(a) and 52(9)(a).
2 HA 2002, ss 2(3) and 3(9); H(W)A 2014, ss 51(2)(c) and 52(9)(c); and see 7.123–7.125 and 7.167–7.168.

7.76 A review of the content or methodology in the many hundreds of local housing authorities’ published reviews and strategies is beyond the scope of this book. However, between 2003 and 2008, there were several useful reviews of initial local homelessness strategies.

7.77 In January 2004, Shelter published The Act in Action, an assessment of homelessness reviews and strategies. Shelter’s conclusion was that:

‘. . . compiling reviews and strategies appears to have produced positive outcomes beyond simply delivering an assessment of homelessness levels and patterns. In a broader sense, it has enabled authorities to identify gaps in their knowledge (even where these gaps are yet to be tackled), build stronger relationships with other departments and agencies and develop a multi-agency approach not just to homelessness, but also to wider issues.’

1 The Act in Action, an assessment of homelessness reviews and strategies (Shelter, January 2004).

7.78 A more detailed national picture was given in Homelessness strategies – a survey of local authorities published by the LGA. It contained the troubling finding that only 52% of local housing authorities thought that the exercise of preparing a strategy would help to any extent in determining likely future levels of homelessness in their areas.

7.79 During the first half of 2004, Housing Quality Network Services carried out an evaluation of homelessness strategies on behalf of the UK Government (and consulted a number of local housing authorities in England). A summary of that evaluation was published (Local Authorities’ Homelessness Strategies: Evaluation and Good Practice) and local housing authorities were encouraged to refer to it in carrying out future local homelessness reviews and drawing up further local strategies. The research considered both homelessness reviews and homelessness strategies.

7.79 Local Housing Authorities’ Homelessness Reviews

1 Local Authorities’ Homelessness Strategies: Evaluation and Good Practice (ODPM, 2004).

7.80 The ODPM issued a policy briefing Homelessness Strategies: Moving Forward based on this evaluation. The document recommended that local housing authorities in England bring forward plans for comprehensively reviewing their homelessness strategies. It suggested that they should be:

- ensuring greater involvement from the voluntary sector;
- engaging in more cooperation with other authorities, regions and agencies;
- working with Supporting People authorities; and
- taking a more multi-agency approach.

1 ODPM, November 2004.

7.81 Much of the material in the Policy Briefing was taken forward into the content of the 2006 edition of the Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities.

1 CLG July 2006.

7.82 Following publication of the 2006 Code, the CLG published Preventing Homelessness: A Strategy Health Check, which will have been used by local housing authorities in preparing their new strategies in 2008. There was no attempt to repeat the earlier exercise of calling in, for review and evaluation, the individual strategies of local housing authorities in England. Indeed, there have been no further publications from government on the subject of homelessness strategies since 2006.

1 CLG, September 2006.

7.83 The remainder of this chapter will outline the detailed legal duties imposed on local housing authorities in relation to local homelessness reviews and strategies, the powers given to them, and the guidance that has been provided. All statutory references in this chapter, unlike the rest of this book, are to the Homelessness Act 2002 (HA 2002), and not to the Housing Act 1996 unless specifically stated. For local housing authorities in Wales, from 27 April 2015, the relevant legislation is H(W)A 2014, ss 50–52.

7.84 To avoid confusion, it is necessary to emphasise that a local ‘Homelessness Strategy’ is not the same thing as a local ‘Housing Strategy’ nor the local ‘tenancy strategy’. The housing strategy was, until 26 May 2015, required by the terms of any direction made to local housing authorities in England and in Wales under the Local Government Act 2003. Since 26 May 2015, the obligation to have a housing strategy only applies to local housing authorities in Wales. Local housing authorities in England are required to prepare and publish a tenancy strategy by the Localism Act 2011. Both strategies are beyond the scope of this book.

1 Local Government Act 2003, s 87.
2 Local Government Act 2003, s 87, amended by Deregulation Act 2015, s 29.
3 Localism Act 2011, s 150.
A power or a duty to have local reviews and strategies?

7.85 Strictly speaking, HA 2002, only gives a power to local housing authorities in England to carry out homelessness reviews for their districts and to formulate and publish homelessness strategies based on the results of those reviews.

1 HA 2002, s 1(1).

7.86 However, HA 2002 also set out mandatory time-scales for the publication of the first local homelessness strategies and of further strategies thereafter. It thereby converted the power to formulate and publish the local homelessness strategy into a duty.

1 HA 2002, s 1(3) and (4).

7.87 The intention is that strategies will follow the local homelessness review. Homelessness strategies are defined as being ‘based on the results of that review’. It follows that local housing authorities in England are under a duty both to conduct reviews and to formulate and publish strategies.

1 HA 2002, s 1(1)(b).

7.88 For local housing authorities in Wales, the position is much clearer. H(W)A 2014, s 50(1) imposes a duty on local housing authorities to carry out reviews and formulate and adopt homelessness strategies. They are also under a duty to publish the results.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 51(2).

A power or a duty to have regard to the local strategy?

7.89 Once the strategy has been published, the local housing authority is under a duty to take its content into account when exercising its homelessness functions or, indeed, any of its other statutory functions. The strategy should therefore inform, for example, a local housing authority’s adoption of a housing allocation scheme as well as the decisions on any individual homelessness application.

1 HA 2002, s 1(5); H(W)A 2014, s 50(4); further discussed at 7.183–7.185.

7.90 In R (Ho-Sang) v Lewisham London Borough Council, an applicant for homelessness assistance, who had not been provided with interim accommodation to which she was entitled, brought a test case challenging the local housing authority’s routine and systematic practice of turning away applicants without providing interim accommodation. The judicial review claim cited the local housing authority’s homelessness review, which had identified the provision of interim accommodation as being a major problem for the local housing authority, and challenged the homelessness strategy, which only made provision for 50 additional units of temporary accommodation. The local housing authority settled the judicial review claim by conceding that the strategy was inadequate and agreeing to take measures to acquire additional units of interim accommodation (in addition to accepting that it owed the claimant a duty to provide interim accommodation which it would perform).

Action, p 19, Admin Ct.

Duty on adult care and children’s services to cooperate

7.91 In the case of non-unitary authorities in England, the adult care and children’s services authorities are under a duty to give their local housing authority (or authorities) such assistance as the local housing authority (or authorities) may reasonably require with both the carrying out of the local review and the formulation of the homelessness strategy1. Examples of the types of assistance that might be required are given in the Homelessness Codes of Guidance for both England and Wales. They range through:

• providing information to the local housing authority, as part of the review process; to
• providing financial assistance so as to prevent homelessness; and
• providing support with homeless persons’ associated needs2.

1 HA 2002, s 1(2). There is no equivalent obligation in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 because Welsh local housing authorities are all part of unitary authorities: counties or county boroughs. However, the Welsh Code emphasises a corporate approach to preventing and tackling homelessness, including from children’s services: Welsh Code, para 5.10. There is also a general obligation on county or county borough councils to promote cooperation between officers exercising social services functions and officers exercising local housing authority functions with a view to achieving the prevention of homelessness, and the provision of suitable accommodation and support: H(W)A 2014, s 98.

7.92 Once the exercise has been completed and a local homelessness strategy has been drawn up, the adult care and children’s services authorities are under a duty to take the homelessness strategy into account when carrying out their functions1. This duty may particularly assist young people, or disabled people, who are homeless and also have needs for support or assistance from adult care or children’s services authorities or departments. The English Code advises ‘since a large proportion of people who are homeless or at risk of homelessness will be vulnerable adults or have children in their care, it will always be necessary to seek assistance from the social services authority to formulate an effective homelessness strategy’2.

1 HA 2002, s 1(6); H(W)A 2014, s 50(4).
2 English Code, paras 2.212–2.22.

7.93 In the case of unitary authorities, the same obligations apply to the adult care and children’s services departments to provide assistance at the strategy design stage and to take account of the strategy in the performance of their own functions1.

Duty on private registered providers and registered social landlords to cooperate

7.94 Private registered providers (England) and registered social landlords (Wales) are under a duty to cooperate with local housing authorities to assist them in performing their functions under Housing Act 1996, Pts 6 and 7, and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, if requested, and so far as is reasonable. They would normally expect to be consulted by local housing authorities before homelessness strategies are adopted or modified.\(^1\)

7.95 Prior to 31 March 2015, the Homes and Communities Agency’s Regulatory Framework, which contains the requirements that private registered providers of social housing must meet, included advice that private registered providers should cooperate with local housing authorities. The current Regulatory framework encourages private registered providers to contribute to the environmental, social and economic well-being of the area.\(^1\)

\(^1\) Regulating the Standards (Homes and Communities Agency, 2017).

7.96 In Wales, the previous Regulatory Framework for Housing Associations Registered in Wales\(^1\) required registered social landlords to support local housing authorities in the delivery of their strategic housing roles. That advice has not been replicated in the current Framework. The Welsh Code advises that local housing authorities, housing associations and voluntary sector organisations should be working together to address housing need.\(^2\)

\(^3\) Welsh Code, paras 6.8–6.12.

LOCAL HOMELESSNESS REVIEWS

7.97 Since the local homelessness strategy must be based on the results of the homelessness review, the review must logically be carried out and concluded first, although generally many local housing authorities publish both documents simultaneously, or publish their review and strategy within the same document.\(^1\)

\(^1\) HA 2002, s 2; H(W)A 2014, s 51.

7.98 The review is an audit of the local scene in relation to homelessness. It is defined to mean a review of:

(1) the levels and likely future levels of homelessness in the local housing authority’s district;
Local Housing Authorities’ Homelessness Reviews

(2) the activities which are carried out in the district for the purpose of preventing homelessness, securing accommodation for people who are or may be homeless, or providing support for those people or for formerly homeless people who need support to prevent them becoming homeless again; and

(3) the resources available to the local housing authority, the adult care and children's services authorities, other public authorities, voluntary organisations and other persons in the district for carrying out these activities.

1 HA 2002, s 2(1)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 51(1)(a).
2 HA 2002, s 2(1)(b) and (2); H(W)A 2014, s 51(1)(b).
3 HA 2002, s 2(1)(c); H(W)A 2014, s 51(1)(c).

Each of those aspects will be considered in turn.

What is meant by ‘homelessness’ for the purposes of conducting the review?

7.100 To be able to assess current and future levels of homelessness with any accuracy, the review must apply the relevant meaning of ‘homelessness’. But there can be different interpretations of that concept. Does it mean the likely numbers of applicants to the local housing authority for HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, assistance? Or does it have a more practical interpretation, referring to the likely number of people who will be homeless, whether they seek the help of the local housing authority or not? Does it refer simply to literal street homelessness or does it also include those living in temporary or insecure accommodation?

7.101 The English Code advises local housing authorities that ‘the review must take account of all forms of homelessness within the meaning of the [HA] 1996, and should therefore consider a wide population of households who are homeless or at risk of becoming homeless. This will include people sleeping rough and those whose accommodation and circumstances make them more likely than others to become homeless including sleeping rough’. Local housing authorities in England should not, therefore, consider only those applicants towards whom the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty has been accepted in the past, or would be accepted in the future. They should ensure that homeless people who do not have a priority need, or who are or have become or may become homeless intentionally, also fall within the scope of the review. The Codes specifically refer to ‘people sleeping rough’, as well as ‘those who might be more difficult to identify’. The review should therefore consider those who are likely, in future, to have no accommodation that they are entitled to occupy and also those who do have (or will have) accommodation that is not reasonable for them to continue to occupy.

1 English Code, para 2.17.
Local homelessness reviews 7.106

7.102 The Welsh Code contains a different definition of homelessness drawn up by the Welsh Government: ‘where a person lacks accommodation or where their tenure is not secure’ – and gives examples of the types of people, and the types of accommodation, that would fall within that definition.

7.103 Both Codes therefore draw attention to the needs of those in insecure accommodation as well as those who are literally roofless. The statutory emphasis (on preventing homelessness, identifying those who might become homeless in the future, and providing support to those who are potentially homeless) should mean that local housing authorities in England and Wales are considering various different groups of people when undertaking their reviews.

Current and future levels of homelessness in the local housing authority’s district

7.104 In order to ascertain what levels of homelessness there are currently are, and to predict what levels there may be in the future, the review will need to analyse data on local homelessness in the recent past, on current homelessness, and on likely future homelessness.

7.105 The local housing authority will have its own records and statistics of the number of homelessness applications it has received in the past, and the outcome of those applications. It will also regularly compile returns for the UK and Welsh governments’ statistics. However, the review should not be confined to those records of past homelessness alone.

7.106 The local housing authority should take into account any information it possesses (or can find with reasonable diligence) on the local homelessness problem. That will include counts or estimates of the numbers of people sleeping rough and estimates of the numbers of people who are staying with family or friends on a temporary or insecure basis. The local housing authority can also consider its own records of the numbers (and outcomes) of possession proceedings it has brought, and the records held by the local court and by local private registered providers or registered social landlords. Local advice agencies may hold records and statistics on the numbers of clients who seek homelessness or housing advice. Hospitals, prisons, the armed forces, and the National Offender Management Service should all have records of people discharged from their various services who had nowhere to live. Children’s services departments or authorities should be asked for their statistics on homeless families with children, young people leaving care and children in need requiring accommodation. Local hostels and refuges should also be asked for figures. This should provide, in its totality, a fairly accurate picture of both past and current homelessness.

1 Formerly the Probation Service.
2 English Code, paras 2.19–2.20; Welsh Code, paras 5.25–5.29.

7.107 In order to predict future levels of homelessness in the district, the local housing authority will need to identify those groups of people most likely to be at risk of homelessness, the reasons why they might become homeless and the extent to which the supply of affordable accommodation locally is likely to increase or decrease.

7.108 The Welsh Code suggest that young people estranged from their families or leaving care, vulnerable people leaving the armed forces or prison, people exposed to domestic or other violence or abuse, vulnerable people with mental health problems, learning disabilities, age-related problems or ill health, people with drug and alcohol problems, people with debt problems, those suffering harassment or abuse from outside the home, and former asylum-seekers given permission to stay in the UK, are likely to be amongst those with a higher risk of homelessness. It also recommends drawing up a profile of those who have experienced homelessness.

1 Welsh Code, paras 5.33–5.37. There is particular emphasis in the Welsh Code on identifying the extent of rough sleeping, so as to try to eliminate it: Welsh Code, para 5.35.
2 Welsh Code, paras 5.30–5.32.

7.109 The English Code does not contain similar recommendations, except to the effect that a large proportion of people who are homeless will be vulnerable adults or have children in their care. Instead it refers to ‘a wide population of households’ who are homeless or at risk of becoming homeless, including those sleeping rough. It recommends considering the profile of households who have experienced homelessness in the district but does not contain any guidance as to the contents of that profile.

1 English Code, para 2.21.
2 English Code, para 2.17.
3 English Code, para 2.18(d).

7.110 The identification of the current and future levels of homelessness in the district is a substantial task, involving social and economic mapping and projections. Bare statistics of current or recent applications for homelessness assistance, whilst of importance in contributing to the review, will not suffice on their own.

1 Welsh Code, paras 5.25–5.29.

7.111 The UK Government-commissioned evaluation of homelessness strategies in 2003 found that many local housing authorities in England had difficulties in assessing future levels of homelessness. Local housing authorities that tackled the issue well had used: population trends; indicators of needs, demands and aspirations from Housing Needs Surveys; trends in homelessness data; and plans for prevention through, for example, advice to those leaving prison, hospital or care. In recent years, the homelessness statistics published by both the UK Government and the Welsh Government have recorded a significant increase in the numbers of people being made homeless from private rented accommodation. It follows that homelessness reviews should consider preventative efforts to keep private tenants in their own homes, such as funding court-based duty advice schemes or making assistance available to tenants in financial difficulties.
Local homelessness reviews 7.115

1 Local Authorities’ Homelessness Strategies: Evaluation and Good Practice (ODPM Homelessness Research Summary, Number 1, 2004). See also 7.79.

2 See 7.20 (England) and 7.38 (Wales).

Current activities being carried out

7.112 This is the second matter that HA 2002 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, require to be considered within the local homelessness review. The required review of activities currently being carried out should not be confined to the activity of the local housing authority’s own homeless persons’ department or housing options officer(s).

1 HA 2002, s 2(1)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 51(1)(b); English Code paras 2.14–2.22, 2.25–2.62; Welsh Code, paras 5.17–5.40.

7.113 The current ‘activities’ to be reviewed are defined as activities for the purposes of:

(1) preventing homelessness in the local housing authority’s district;
(2) securing that accommodation is or will be available for people who are currently homeless or may become homeless; and
(3) providing support for those people and for people who were formerly homeless and need support to prevent them becoming homeless again.

1 HA 2002, s 2(2); H(W)A 2014, s 51(1)(b). For local housing authorities in Wales, the support provided for people who may become homeless in the future is also relevant: H(W)A 2014, s 51(1)(b)(ii).

7.114 The Codes recommend that the activities, and resources, of public, private and voluntary sectors should be considered.

1 English Code, paras 2.19, 2.27–2.29; Welsh Code, para 5.32.

7.115 Activities for the prevention of homelessness, for securing accommodation and for providing support to homeless people (or those likely to become homeless) go much further than simply providing a roof over someone’s head. They can include the ‘activities’ of giving advice on the availability of benefits and employment, on debt management and on other financial issues. Local housing authorities and adult care and children’s services authorities have statutory powers to provide assistance in the form of rent deposits, rent guarantees and disabled facilities grants for adaptations. The exercise of those powers is a relevant activity. Local charities, or even local businesses, may provide limited financial assistance to the homeless and they too would be relevant ‘activities’. The local housing authority should also consider what other ‘activities’ are being carried out to provide support for the homeless and for those potentially homeless, including support with their other needs, such as health care, education, food (through the provision or funding of food banks) etc.

Resources currently available for such activities

7.116 This is the third matter that HA 2002 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, require to be considered within the local homelessness review. The local housing authority should obviously consider its own resources, and also those available to the adult care and children’s services authorities, other public authorities, voluntary organisations and any other persons. ‘Resources’ in this context means far more than just the financial resources available to tackle local homelessness. Both current Codes of Guidance place even more emphasis than earlier editions did on the importance that each government attaches to a move away from the historic local housing authority role as the potential provider of the resources (and, most particularly, homes) for relieving homelessness and into a more modern role of encouraging and facilitating provision by others. The focus has very much shifted from inviting attention to the resources that might be supplied by the local housing authority itself to those which may be marshalled from others in relation to homelessness. As elsewhere in the current Codes, the primary emphasis is on those resources which may be directed to homelessness prevention in the first instance. For local housing authorities in England, the provisions first of the Localism Act 2011, and now of the HRA 2017, make it even clearer that the government views the local housing authority as housing enabler rather than as housing provider. The provisions of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, for local housing authorities in Wales, take a similar approach, emphasising prevention and use of the private rented sector.

1 HA 2002, s 2(1)(c); H(W)A 2014, s 51(1); English Code, paras 2.19–2.20, 2.34–2.62; Welsh Code, paras 5.38–5.40.

7.117 When it comes to their own resources in relation to prevention, local housing authorities are advised to consider their own infrastructure and those of other service providers.

1 English Code, paras 2.29–2.29; Welsh Code, paras 5.37–5.38.

7.118 Physical resources available for securing accommodation to those actually homeless obviously include the local housing authority’s own housing stock and that of private registered providers, registered social landlords and private landlords in the district. The availability of hostel and refuge spaces should also be considered.

7.119 The mechanisms available to increase the supply of accommodation should be taken into account. These include:

- securing affordable accommodation through planning conditions;
- future developments by private registered providers or registered social landlords;
- the resources made available by the government to the local housing authority; and Local homelessness reviews 7.122

- the extent of new development, self-build homes, shared ownership schemes, etc.

1 English Code, paras 2.37–2.42.
2 Welsh Code, para 5.19 and 5.3–5.40.

7.120 The local housing authority should consider what initiatives could increase the supply of affordable accommodation. Can the local housing authority increase the proportion of lettings made available by private registered providers or registered social landlords or that of affordable homes obtained through planning conditions, etc?

7.121 Local housing authorities are advised to take all available steps to identify the housing resources that might be available in their districts. This includes taking the opportunity of filling any empty accommodation in the district. Such a ‘strategy for minimising empty homes’ should be an integral part of the homelessness review and strategy and should include tackling any hard-to-let properties, bringing empty private sector properties back into use and encouraging landlords to let flats over shops. The local housing authority should consider what financial resources are available that could be used to encourage private homeowners to repair empty properties and make them available for letting. The powers to take over and manage empty properties should also be considered. ‘Resources’ for these purposes also includes the resources available to provide ‘support’ to homeless people, to those likely to become homeless and to those formerly homeless people who need support to prevent them losing their accommodation. This will embrace the availability of housing benefit and other welfare benefits locally, the provision of easily accessible advice, and accommodation with specific levels of support (for single people, rough sleepers, families, victims of domestic abuse, and those in temporary accommodation etc). In keeping with the modern policy emphasis on sustainability of new homes for the homeless, the current English Code deals with the importance of reviewing resources available locally for ‘support’.

1 English Code, para 2.34; Welsh Code, para 5.19.

Consultation

7.122 There are no formal obligations on a local housing authority to consult over the contents of its homelessness review. However, local housing authorities in Wales are advised in the Welsh Code to consult homeless people, seeking their views about their own situations, their needs, their experiences of services and ‘what works’, any barriers to services and any suggestions for improve-
Local Housing Authorities’ Homelessness Reviews

In contrast, there are obligations on local housing authorities in both England and Wales to consult over the contents of their homelessness strategies, see 7.138–7.147.

Welsh Code, para 5.20, see 7.145.

Publication and inspection

Once the review is completed, the local housing authority is required to ensure that the results of the review can be inspected by any member of the public, free, at its principal office.

Lewisham London Borough Council was found to have acted in breach of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 when it failed to provide, in response to a request, updated information on material originally published in its homelessness review (Information Commissioner’s Office Decision Notice FS50092310, 7 August 2006, (2006) October Legal Action, p 25).

It is also required to provide a copy of those results to any member of the public who requests one. The local housing authority may charge a reasonable fee for copying.

Local housing authorities in Wales are required to make the results of their review available on their websites (if they have them), and local housing authorities in England are advised to do the same.

In practice, many local housing authorities make the whole of their review (and strategy) available on their website whether required to do so or not. Local libraries may provide free internet access enabling these documents to be read online free of charge.

The following points apply to local housing authorities in Wales, but not to local housing authorities in England. Local housing authorities in Wales:

• are under an express duty to carry out a homelessness review for the local housing authority’s area;
• must apply a broad definition of homelessness: ‘where a person lacks accommodation or where their tenure is not secure’;
• should ensure that the scope of the review, when considering what accommodation and support is available, should include people who may become homeless as well as those who are homeless;
• are under a duty to make the results of the review available on the local housing authority’s website, if it has one; and
• are subject to a recommendation in the Welsh Code that the views of homeless people should be sought when the local housing authority is carrying out the review and drawing up the strategy.

Guidance on these points is given at paras 5.17–5.40 of the Welsh Code.

Wales

7.126 The following points apply to local housing authorities in Wales, but not to local housing authorities in England. Local housing authorities in Wales:

Guidance on these points is given at paras 5.17–5.40 of the Welsh Code.

LOCAL HOMELESSNESS STRATEGIES

Overview

7.127 Once the local housing authority has assembled the raw material and completed its review, it can begin to formulate its strategy (or to reconsider an earlier strategy)¹.

1 HA 2002, s 3; H(W)A 2014, s 52.

7.128 The required content of the local homelessness strategy is defined in HA 2002, s 3 and H(W)A 2014, s 52¹. The strategy to be formulated by the local housing authority must be a strategy for:

1. the prevention of homelessness in the local housing authority’s district²;
2. the securing of suitable accommodation for those people in the local housing authority’s district who are, or may become, homeless³; and
3. the provision of satisfactory services to those people in the local housing authority’s district who are actually or potentially homeless, including those who used to be homeless and now need support in order to prevent them becoming homeless again⁴.

1 HA 2002, s 3; H(W)A 2014, s 52.
2 HA 2002, s 3(1)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 52(1)(a).
3 HA 2002, s 3(1)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 52(1)(b).
4 HA 2002, s 3(1)(c); H(W)A 2014, s 52(1)(c). H(W)A 2014, s 52(1)(c) does not include the reference to those who were previously homeless and might become homeless again.

7.129 The strategy is based on the results of the homelessness review¹ and must identify specific objectives for the local housing authority and specific action as to how the local housing authority aims to achieve those objectives⁵. It must also take into account the local housing authority’s current allocation scheme, the local tenancy strategy once published and, for London borough councils, the current London Housing Strategy⁶.

1 HA 2002, s 1(1)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 50(1)(b).
2 HA 2002, s 3(2); H(W)A 2014, s 52(2) where the wording is ‘may’ rather than ‘must’.
3 HA 2002, s 3(7A) inserted by LA 2011, s 153; this does not apply to local housing authorities in Wales.

7.130 A multi-agency approach¹ enables the local housing authority to identify specific objectives and action, not only for itself, but also for the local adult care and children’s services authorities or departments². The local housing authority can also identify specific action to be taken by any of the other organisations involved, but only if each organisation agrees to that action being included in the strategy³.

1 See 7.138–7.144.
2 HA 2002, s 3(2)(a) and (b); H(W)A 2014, s 52(2).
7.130 Local Housing Authorities’ Homelessness Reviews

3 HA 2002, s 3(3) and (4); H(W)A 2014, s 52(3) and (4).

7.131 As with the homelessness review¹, the strategy, once completed, must be made available free for inspection and the public permitted to purchase copies². Local housing authorities in Wales are required to publish the strategy on their websites, if they have them³.

² HA 2002, s 3(9); H(W)A 2014, s 52(9)(b) and (c).
³ H(W)A 2014, s 52(9)(a).

7.132 Local housing authorities in Wales are required to include in the strategy provision for specific action to be taken by the local housing authority, and by other public authorities, voluntary organisations and anyone else involved in the multi-agency approach, to assist any person who may be in particular need of support if they are or may become homeless. Five groups of such people are identified but the list is not exclusive. Those five groups are:

- people leaving prison or youth detention accommodation;
- young people leaving care;
- people leaving the regular armed forces of the Crown;
- people leaving hospital after medical treatment for mental disorder as an in-patient; and
- people receiving mental health services in the community¹.

¹ HA 2002, s 1(5) and (6); H(W)A 2014, s 50(4) which requires county and county borough councils in Wales to take the homelessness strategy into account in the exercise of any of its functions, not just those relating to housing, adult services or children’s services, so planning, education and any other statutory functions are included.
² In Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council v Norton [2011] EWCA Civ 834, [2011] HLR 46, CA, the Court of Appeal held that a local housing authority was required to take into account its public sector equality duty (now contained at Equality Act 2010, s 149) when considering whether or not to bring possession proceedings against one of its tenants whose household contained a disabled person. For local housing authorities in Wales, H(W)A 2014, s 50(4) is quite clear that the homelessness strategy should be taken into account when exercising any of its functions, including its housing management functions.

7.134 The children’s services authority or department should take the local housing authority’s homelessness strategy into account when exercising its functions under the Children Act 1989, so that assistance can be given to homeless young people or to homeless families with children¹. The strategy should also be taken into account when the adult care authority or department considers its obligations under community care legislation towards those with mental health needs, drug and alcohol abuse problems, the disabled, and ill or elderly people.\(^1\)

\(^1\) HA 2002 s 1(6); H(W)A 2014, s 50(4).

Identification of objectives for the strategy

7.135 The English Code gives examples of the types of specific objectives and actions that might be included in a homelessness strategy for the local housing authority and for the adult care and children’s services authorities or departments. Obviously, the strategy must be drawn with relevant consideration of the local housing authority’s wider responsibilities in relation to equality and diversity issues.\(^1\)

\(^1\) English Code, paras 2.21–2.74.

7.136 The Welsh Code advises that four themes, underpinning the Welsh Government’s Ten Year Homelessness Plan, should be taken into account in planning homelessness services:

• preventing homelessness wherever possible; and
• working across organisational and policy boundaries; and
• placing the service user at the centre of service delivery; and
• ensuring social inclusion and equality of access to services.\(^2\)

\(^1\) See 7.27.

\(^2\) Welsh Code, para 5.41.

7.137 It also advises that local housing authorities should be working with ‘partners’ to prepare a strategic approach to tackling homelessness, so that partners can assist with prevention work, securing accommodation, securing access to support services, provision of Supporting People and other support services and collaboration with the NHS, Criminal Justice and Community Safety agencies. Services should be designed around the needs of users, so that they are accessible, flexible, responsive to each homeless household’s needs. The Code advises that ‘[t]he empowerment of service users should lie at the heart of all homelessness planning’\(^1\), and that good practice includes adopting the Equal Ground Standard\(^2\) developed by Shelter Cymru.

\(^1\) Welsh Code, paras 5.42–5.43.

\(^2\) See 7.33.

Consultation and the multi-agency approach

7.138 The local housing authority is required to consult before adopting a homelessness strategy or modifying it. HA 2002 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, give local housing authorities a very broad discretion as to which organisations should be consulted, being such public or local authorities, voluntary organisations or other persons as it considers appropriate. The English Code offers
7.138 Local Housing Authorities' Homelessness Reviews

A list of those with whom a local housing authority in England may wish to consult. The Welsh Code contains a whole chapter on partnership working with other organisations.

1. HA 2002, s 3(8); H(W)A 2014, s 52(8).
2. English Code, para 2.10.
3. Welsh Code, chapter 6, para 6.13 contains guidance on organisations to be consulted over the contents of the homelessness strategy.

7.139 Adult care and children’s services authorities are required to cooperate with the local housing authority to the extent that the local housing authority may reasonably require. Examples of joint working between the local housing authority and children’s services include joint assessments of homeless families with children. The Welsh Code makes it clear that joint working is expected to assist people who may be in particular need of support if they are or may become homeless, particularly the five groups of people identified at H(W)A 2014, s 52(6).

1. HA 2002, s 1(2). There is no equivalent provision in relation to homelessness strategies in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, but H(W)A 2014, s 95, requires social services departments to cooperate in the exercise of any of the local housing authority’s functions under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. Chapters 5 and 6 of the Welsh Code make it very clear that social services departments are expected to cooperate with housing and homelessness functions, see Welsh Code, para 6.3.
2. English Code, paras 2.21 and 2.70; Welsh Code, para 5.57.
3. For the five groups, see 7.178; Welsh Code, para 5.65.

7.140 Both HA 2002 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, require a multi-agency approach, reaching far beyond the local housing authority or even other public authorities. This multi-agency approach has been strengthened in recent years by the statutory duties to co-operate at H(W)A 2014, s 95 for certain bodies in Wales and HA 1996, s 213B for public authorities in England. The local housing authority is required to consider whether any of the objectives can be achieved through joint action with the adult care or children’s services authorities or departments, with other public authorities, with voluntary organisations or with other people whose activities might contribute to their achievement. The strategy should then identify which of those organisations will take what specific action, either individually or in association with other organisations. The strategy should only identify specific action to be taken by other public authorities if those other authorities or organisations consent to their inclusion.

2. Inserted by HRA 2017, s 10, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.222–15.228.
3. HA 2002, s 3(3) and (5); H(W)A 2014, s 52(3) and (5).
4. HA 2002, s 3(4); H(W)A 2014, s 52(4).

7.141 The other organisations that should be consulted over the contents of the homelessness strategy, and the extent to which the actions within the strategy can be performed by them, fall into two categories:
Local homelessness strategies 7.145

(1) public authorities (other than the local housing authority and adult care or children’s services authority) which have functions that are capable of contributing to the achievement of the objectives of preventing homelessness, securing sufficient accommodation, and securing the satisfactory provision of support; and

(2) any voluntary organisation or other person whose activities are capable of contributing to the achievement of the objectives.

1 HA 2002, s 3(3)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 52(3)(a).
2 HA 2002, s 3(3)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 52(3)(b).

7.142 Public authorities whose functions may contribute to the objectives of the homelessness strategy include the health authority and other health organisations, the police, the National Offender Management Service, the Department for Work and Pensions, UK Visas and Immigration, the armed forces, education and employment programmes, etc.

7.143 The voluntary organisations and ‘other persons’ mentioned in the legislation would obviously include housing advice agencies and citizens’ advice bureaux, local private registered providers or registered social landlords, private landlords and their representative forums. Casting the net wider, youth action groups, refuges, faith groups, victim support groups, refugee organisations, local businesses and the Samaritans are also suggested as possible organisations to contribute to the strategies. Local housing authorities are advised, in the English Code, to consider ‘public, private and voluntary sectors’. In particular, local housing authorities should be entering into partnerships with local private registered providers or registered social landlords.

1 Welsh Code, para 5.58.
3 Welsh Code, paras 6.8–6.12.

7.144 The UK Government-commissioned evaluation in 2004 of the initial local housing authority homelessness strategies in England noted that the involvement of adult care and children’s services at a strategic level tended to be disappointing, and that other statutory agencies, such as health and probation services, were also hard to engage. When those other agencies did play a part, they provided helpful input.

Consulting the homeless

7.145 There is no specific requirement in either HA 2002 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, to consult the former or current users of the local housing authority’s services, homeless people, or people who have been or might become homeless. However, the broad discretion given to local housing authorities to consult ‘such . . . voluntary organisations or other persons as they consider appropriate’ certainly permits them to consult both representative forums for the homeless and individual homeless people themselves. The English Code suggests that local housing authorities should consult service users and specialist agencies that provide support to homeless people. The Welsh Code describes the views of homeless people as ‘important to developing a successful strategic approach to homelessness’. It recommends that they should be consulted about their own views on their situation; their needs; their experience of services and ‘what works’; any barriers to services; and any suggestions for improvement. Any consultation carried out by a local housing authority must be framed in accordance with the public law requirements of fairness, ensuring that all the different alternative options are fully set out to the public.
7.145 Local Housing Authorities' Homelessness Reviews

1 HA 2002, s 3(8); H(W)A 2014, s 52(8).
2 English Code, para 2.10.
3 Welsh Code, para 5.20.

7.146 Many local housing authorities have taken the opportunity to consult homeless people in their district. Shelter's review of homelessness strategies in 2004 noted:

‘... consultation with users has enabled authorities to identify and distinguish between the needs of different groups and plan for services which meet their particular needs, rather than providing a “blanket” approach to the problem of homelessness. Importantly, they have identified the need to adopt a proactive approach to tackling homelessness.’

1 The Act in action: an assessment of homelessness reviews and strategies (Shelter, January 2004). See also 7.77.

7.147 The UK Government-commissioned evaluation of initial strategies noted that, in general, local housing authorities found it difficult to engage with homeless people and users of homelessness services. Local housing authorities said to have addressed this problem creatively had gone to speak to homeless people on the street, or gone into hostels or day centres to talk with them.

1 Local Authorities: Homelessness Strategies: Evaluation and Good Practice (ODPM Homelessness Research Summary, Number 1, 2004). See also 7.79.

The three matters the strategy must address

7.148 As already indicated, HA 2002 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, require a local homelessness strategy to address three essential matters: prevention; provision of accommodation; and support.

1 See 7.128.

7.149 Following consideration and evaluation of the first homelessness strategies in England published in 2003, the opportunity was taken in the 2006 edition of the English Code to expand substantially the advice previously given by government on the content of the strategies. The current edition of the English Code has far less detail in it.

1 English Code, chapter 2; see also Welsh Code, chapter 12.
Local homelessness strategies 7.153

7.150 Each of the three essential components of a local homelessness strategy is considered in the following paragraphs.

1) Prevention of homelessness

7.151 This is the first of the three matters that HA 2002 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, require the strategy to address. ‘Prevention of homelessness’ is now a key policy aim for both the UK and Welsh Governments. In addition, there are now new duties on local housing authorities in both England and Wales to help applicants prevent their own homelessness. Any strategy to prevent homelessness will obviously include ensuring that general advice and information on homelessness, housing benefit and other welfare benefits, occupiers’ rights, etc is available, and is both comprehensive and effective. The local housing authority has a statutory obligation to ensure that free advice and information on homelessness assistance is available to any person in its district.

1 HA 2002, s 3(1)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 52(1)(a); English Code, paras 2.25–2.56; Welsh Code, paras 5.44–5.48.
2 See 7.17–7.31 and 7.27–7.34.

4 English Code, para 2.30; Welsh Code, paras 5.44–5.48 and Chapter 12.
5 HA 1996, s 179(1), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 2, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; see 8.4–8.4; H(W)A 2014, s 60(1). See 8.9–8.11.

7.152 It might be expected that local housing authorities will want to take into account the good practice on homelessness prevention published by the government in Homelessness Strategies – A Good Practice Handbook and Preventing tomorrow’s rough sleepers – A Good Practice Handbook, as well as the comprehensive government publication on the subject: Homelessness Prevention: A guide to good practice. It would also be expected that local housing authorities should take into account the MHCLG or Welsh Government quarterly homelessness statistical reports.

1 DTLR, March 2002.
2 Rough Sleepers Unit, 2001.
3 CLG, June 2006.

7.153 The previous edition of the English Code, and the current Welsh Code, contain some detailed guidance. In order to contribute to homelessness prevention by minimising the number of evictions for rent arrears, the local housing authority itself should aim to have an effective arrears collection policy and should ask local private registered providers or registered social landlords to ensure that their arrears policies take into account the homelessness strategy’s aims. The objective is that all local social landlords should facilitate access to financial and housing advice. The local housing authority is advised to ensure that its housing benefit service is efficient. The Department for Work and Pensions should be asked by local housing authorities to ensure speedy access to budgeting loans or any other financial assistance available.
7.153 Local Housing Authorities’ Homelessness Reviews

The children's services authority should be asked by the local housing authority to exercise its functions under the Children Act 1989 to give children, or families with children, financial assistance with deposits, rent payments in advance, and/or rent guarantees. Tenants in financial difficulties should be enabled to obtain local advice to help them manage their finances or negotiate with any creditors.

1 Welsh Code, para 5.47.

7.154 The previous edition of the English Code, and chapter 12 of the Welsh Code, offer local housing authorities a range of advice on homelessness prevention initiatives. For example:

- actions to help applicants who have been asked to leave accommodation by their parents, relatives or friends, such as ensuring that any accommodation provided at the outset is suitable, operating mediation and reconciliation services, and providing children services support for young people;
- mediation schemes can also help with neighbour disputes that might otherwise lead to one of them leaving his or her home and making an application for homelessness assistance; and
- adaptations can ensure that people with disabilities remain in their own homes, rather than having to apply for accommodation from adult care services.

1 Homelessness statistics in both England and Wales show that this is the second highest cause of homelessness, after loss of an assured shorthold tenancy.
2 But see Robinson v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council [2006] EWCA Civ 1122, [2007] HLR 7, CA, holding that mediation should not be used to delay inquiries and thus deprive a homeless applicant of a benefit to which she would otherwise have been entitled. See 8.69 and 12.136–12.139. Under the modern approach in HA 1996, Pt 7 (as amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, an applicant in Ms Robinson’s position should be assessed as homeless and owed the relief duty (HA 1996, s 189B(2), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5 (2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018 or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1)) and the contacts with her mother and the suggestion of mediation (with a view to the mother agreeing to permit Ms Robinson to return to her former home) would be reasonable steps taken to help Ms Robinson secure suitable accommodation. See 15.138–15.195 and 17.73–17.143.

7.155 The UK Government-commissioned evaluation of homelessness strategies in England published in 2004 recommended a number of ‘good practice ideas’ on prevention. They included:

- refocusing the housing allocation arrangements to reflect the main causes of homelessness, so that an assessment of potential homelessness could be undertaken when someone applies for an ordinary housing allocation;
- improving housing advice services so that there are systems to identify a housing problem and provide advice to prevent homelessness, before an application for homelessness assistance is made;
- mediation schemes to prevent the loss of homes resulting from exclusion by parents, relatives or friends;
- family reconciliation work;
- working with private landlords to develop accreditation schemes;
Local homelessness strategies

- improving housing benefit systems so that the payment of housing benefit is speeded up;
- tackling domestic violence and trying to prevent repeat applications for homelessness assistance from victims of domestic violence;
- identifying the triggers for repeat homelessness;
- addressing homelessness for ex-prisoners (by work with prison advice services);
- addressing the needs of vulnerable tenants at risk from crack dealers;
- reviewing the rent arrears policies of local private registered providers or registered social landlords; and
- providing floating support.

2 Local Authorities’ Homelessness Strategies: Evaluation and Good Practice (ODPM, 2004). See also 7.75.

7.156 These, and all other relevant local opportunities to prevent homelessness, should be considered and addressed in each local housing authority’s homelessness strategy.

(2) Securing that sufficient accommodation is (and will be) available for people who are (or may become) homeless

7.157 This is the second statutory objective of the local homelessness strategy. Its fulfilment is, of course, primarily the responsibility of the local housing authority itself, but private registered providers, registered social landlords, local planning authorities and private landlords should be working with the local housing authority to ensure that the supply of affordable and suitable accommodation is maximised.

1 HA 2002, s 3(1)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 52(1)(b); English Code, paras 2.31–2.56; Welsh Code, paras 5.49–5.53.
2 English Code, paras 2.37–2.42.

7.158 While both Codes of Guidance outline the ways in which accommodation can be secured by local housing authorities in order to meet statutory obligations towards particular homeless applicants for homelessness assistance, the English Code places special emphasis on the role of the local homelessness strategy in enabling a local housing authority to meet likely demand for alternative homes. Paragraphs 2.37–2.56 of the English Code provide guidance, not only as to how the strategy should address the need to secure an increased supply of new housing (through the distribution of financial aid and by planning measures), but also guidance as to the steps that can be taken to maximise the use of existing housing stock, including:

- increasing the supply of new housing by local planning authorities to plan for a mix of housing, identify the size, type, tenure and range of housing and set policies to meet any identified need for affordable housing within development sites;
- maximising use of the private rented sector;
- making best use of existing social housing;
- exercising powers over empty privately-owned property; and
- using housing renewal policies and the disabled facilities grant to maximise use of existing dwellings\(^1\).

---

2. English Code, para 2.43.
3. English Code, paras 2.44–2.50.
4. English Code, para 2.54.
5. English Code, para 2.55–2.56.

7.159 The advice in the Welsh Code is that homelessness strategies should reflect the critical role played by the private rented sector, both in relation to prevention (so that private tenants are assisted to remain in their homes) and in moving on. Local housing authorities should be working proactively with the private rented sector to increase access to affordable, well-managed accommodation\(^1\).

1. Welsh Code, para 5.53.

7.160 The UK Government-commissioned evaluation of the initial homelessness strategies in England published in 2004 noted that, in practice, the proportion of lettings by private registered providers to homeless households (via the local housing authority) is not always at a significant level\(^1\).

7.161 Commenting on this second statutory objective, one judge has said\(^1\):

‘Local authorities such as the defendant may reasonably say that, given the reduction in its housing stock and the pressure of numbers of those seeking accommodation, it is well-nigh impossible at present to achieve what is set out in [Homelessness Act 2002] s 3(1)(b). However, it is important to note that Parliament has clearly placed an understandable emphasis upon the need for authorities to take measures to try to avoid homelessness.’

---

(3) Providing support for people who are (or were, or may be) homeless

7.162 For local housing authorities in England the ‘support’ envisaged, under this third category of matters that must be embraced by the homelessness strategy, falls into two sub-categories\(^1\):

1. ongoing support for those who already are, or may soon become, homeless; and
2. help for formerly homeless people who need support to stay in their new homes\(^2\).

1. HA 2002, s 3(1)(c); H(W)A 2014, s 52(1)(English Code, paras 2.57–2.75; Welsh Code, paras 5.54–5.59.
2. HA 2002, s 3(1)(c)(i) and (ii); H(W)A 2014, s 52(1)(c) which omits the second category.

7.163 Local housing authorities in Wales are required by H(W)A 2014, s 52(1)(c) to achieve the objective of satisfactory support being available for people who are or may become homeless. That does not, however, exclude the possibility of support for formerly homeless people who need support to stay in their new homes, not least because without that support those formerly homeless people may become homeless in the future.

7.164 People in the first sub-category have a greater need for support than the provision of bare advice or minimal services to prevent homelessness. For these purposes, ‘support’ can include help with a homeless person’s drug or alcohol addiction, or mental health problems. Rough sleepers and those in temporary accommodation should be able to have access to primary health care, to employment opportunities and to education.

1 For examples of recent research into the support – or lack of support – available to people who are, or may become, homeless, see Support for single homeless people in England Annual Review 2016 (Homeless Link, 2016); Stop the Scandal: an investigation into mental health and rough sleeping (St Mungos, 2016); Rough Sleepers: access to services and support (England) (House of Commons Library, 2016); and It’s no life at all: Rough Sleepers’ experiences of violence and abuse on the streets of England and Wales (Sanders & Albanese, Crisis, 2016).

7.165 The objectives, and the activities to be carried out, in relation to the second sub-category are very similar to those within the prevention of homelessness objective. Obviously, advice should be available, both from the statutory sector and the voluntary sector, to enable occupiers to stay in their homes. Sources of financial and other assistance should be identified and made available.

1 See 7.182–7.185.

7.166 Both Codes emphasise joint working with key partners and support agencies.

1 English Code, paras 2.57–2.75; Welsh Code, paras 5.54–5.59.

Publication and inspection

7.167 Once the strategy has been completed, the local housing authority is required to make a copy available at its principal office for inspection at all reasonable hours, free, by any member of the public. It must also provide a copy of the strategy to any member of the public who requests one, and can charge a reasonable fee for doing so. These statutory provisions mirror the general requirement on local authorities under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 to provide such information. A local housing authority in Wales must also publish the strategy on its website, and local housing authorities in England are advised to publish the strategy on their website.

1 HA 2002, s 3(9)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 52(9)(b); English Code, para 2.12.
2 HA 2002, s 3(9)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 52(9)(b); English Code, para 2.12.
3 H(W)A 2014, s 52(9)(c); English Code, para 2.12.
4 English Code, para 2.12.

7.168 Since the local housing authority and the local adult care and children’s services authorities are all required to take the homelessness strategy into account in the exercise of their functions, it should be expected that the strategy will be readily available to housing and adult care and children’s ser-

New strategies

7.169 Local housing authorities in England were required to have published their first statutory homelessness strategies by 31 July 2003 and local housing authorities in Wales were required to have published by 30 September 2003. By the end of 2003 all local housing authorities had a first strategy in place.

1 12 months after the HA 2002 was brought into effect.

7.170 But homelessness presents a changing landscape. Local housing authorities can keep up to date with the changing local picture by regularly undertaking the homelessness review function. The power to conduct a statutory homelessness review can be exercised at any time.

1 See 7.66.

7.171 Changing circumstances locally, whether identified by a statutory review or otherwise, may require the local homelessness strategy to be re-visited. There is, accordingly, a general statutory duty to keep the strategy under review and a statutory power to modify it from time to time. Local housing authorities may therefore publish modified strategies at any time. Some anticipated that their initial strategies would stand for three or more years before requiring reconsideration; others revisited their strategies earlier than that.

1 HA 2002, s 3(6); H(W)A 2014, s 52(7).

7.172 Before producing a revised or replacement strategy, the local housing authority may conduct another homelessness review and, in any event, must consult those public and local authorities, voluntary organisations and members of the public whom it considers appropriate to be consulted.

1 HA 2002, s 3(8); H(W)A 2014, s 52(8).

7.173 Any modified or replacement strategy must be made available to the public in the same way as the initial strategy.

1 See 7.167–7.168.

7.174 The English Code advises that local housing authorities might consider modifying their strategies at various key stages including anything that may affect the composition of homelessness and/or the risk of homelessness in the district; anything that may change the delivery of the strategy; changes to the relationships between the partners involved in the strategy; or changes to the organizational structure of the housing authority. The Welsh Code advises that any change which is likely significantly to affect homelessness, or how it is tackled, including stock transfer, will require modifications to homelessness strategies.

1 English Code, para 2.13.
Local homelessness strategies 7.177

7.175 For local housing authorities in England, a new strategy must be published within five years of the publication of the last strategy. In effect, therefore, most local housing authorities had updated and published their homelessness strategy by July 2008 and again by July 2013. Again, before a new strategy is adopted, the appropriate organisations should be consulted. Once the new strategy is adopted, it must be published and made available to members of the public. The next date for publication of a new strategy is July 2018 and those new strategies should take into account the amendments to HA 1996, Pt 7, made by HRA 2017.

1 There was previously an exemption for excellent, 4-star and 3-star local housing authorities. This exemption was revoked with effect from 1 April 2015: Local Audit and Accountability Act 2014 and the English Code advise that all local housing authorities are required to publish homelessness strategies by 1 April 2017: English Code, para 2.3.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 50(2).

7.177 The obligation to keep a homelessness strategy under review and to consult upon necessary modifications to it was considered in R (Calgin) v Enfield London Borough Council. The local housing authority had adopted a homelessness strategy in October 2003, but in spring 2004 it implemented a policy for out-of-borough placements of some homeless households without modifying the strategy or consulting upon its modification. In a challenge brought by judicial review, it was contended that this rendered both the strategy and the policy unlawful. The court found that, at the time of adoption of the strategy, an earlier version of the out-of-borough policy had been in place and the strategy had made reference to households placed out of the borough. The new policy was being applied only to a small proportion (1%) of homeless households. In those circumstances, it was held that there had been no unlawfulness in the failure to modify the strategy or consult upon proposed modification. The judge said:

‘Furthermore it cannot be the case that every variation of each specific policy relating to the homeless and directed to implementing the strategy has to be made the subject of a formal amendment to the strategy document. The time and cost would take valuable resources away from front line services. I accept that in theory the adoption of a major new homelessness policy could involve such a shift from the strategy that a reasonable authority would need to reflect it in a modified strategy and go through the consultation mechanism laid down in the Act.’

7.178 Local Housing Authorities’ Homelessness Reviews

Wales

7.178 The following points apply when local housing authorities in Wales are drawing up their homelessness strategies, but not to local housing authorities in England:

• the strategy must include provision for specific action expected to be taken by the local housing authority and other public authorities, voluntary organisations and other person for people who may be in particular need of support if they are or may become homeless;

• five groups of people who may be in particular need of support are identified; and

• the homelessness strategy must be published on the local housing authority’s website, if it has one.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 52(6); Welsh Code, para 5.65.
2 H(W)A 2014, s 52(6); Welsh Code, para 5.65; see 7.138.
3 H(W)A 2014, s 52(9)(a), see 7.167.

WHO SHOULD DRAW UP THE STRATEGIES AND REVIEWS?

7.179 As already emphasised, the drawing up of the local homelessness strategy and homelessness review is a key task for the local housing authority. These documents will inform all decisions taken by local housing authority officers under HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, and will also set out the local housing authority’s policy commitments, the extent to which it works in partnership with private registered providers, registered social landlords, other statutory agencies and voluntary organisations, and what present and future users of the homelessness service can expect from that service.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in England made on or after 3 April 2018.

7.180 Elsewhere in this book, we discuss the extent to which local housing authorities are permitted to contract out any of the activities that they carry out under HA 1996, Pts 6 and 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. The Local Authorities (Contracting Out of Allocation of Housing and Homelessness Functions) Order 1996 only applies to activities carried out under HA 1996, Pts 6 and 7, and H(W)A 2014, ss 53–100, and not to activities carried out under HA 2002, ss 1–4 or H(W)A 2014, ss 50–52.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in England made on or after 3 April 2018.
2 See Chapter 21.
4 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in England made on or after 3 April 2018.

7.181 By HA 2002, s 1, or H(W)A 2014, s 50(1), a local housing authority is under a ‘duty’ to formulate a homelessness strategy, and that homelessness strategy must be informed by the raw data contained in the homelessness review. There are similar duties imposed by HA 2002, and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, on a local housing authority to arrange for its homelessness strategy and its homelessness review to be available for inspection at all reasonable hours, and to provide a copy of those documents on request on payment of a reasonable charge. Any failure to draw up a homelessness strategy would be a breach of the local housing authority’s duty.
Using the strategies and reviews 7.185

1 See 7.85–7.88.
2 HA 2002, ss 2(3) and 3(9); H(W)A 2014, ss 51(2) and 52(9) where the duty to publish the review and strategy extends to publishing it on the local housing authority’s website, if it has one.

7.182 The task of formulating the homelessness review and strategy may be contracted out, in that it might be appropriate for a local housing authority to seek assistance in the formulation of those documents from other organisations, such as staff working for private registered providers, registered social landlords, etc. However, the final content of the homelessness review and strategy should be the local housing authority’s decision.

USING THE STRATEGIES AND REVIEWS

7.183 The local homelessness review document will contain essential data on the local homelessness (and prevention of homelessness) scene. It will therefore be an invaluable source of data for those providing, or planning to provide, housing-related services in a local housing authority’s district. It will also help the local housing authority itself in dealing with the exercise of judgment in individual homelessness cases. For example, in assessing whether a person is ‘homeless’ or ‘has become homeless intentionally’ a local housing authority may (for limited purposes) have regard to ‘general circumstances prevailing in relation to housing in the district’.

7.184 The local homelessness strategy document is an essential additional ingredient in the local housing authority’s own work in dealing with individual applications for homelessness assistance and/or housing allocation. The requirement on local housing authorities to ‘take their homelessness strategy into account’ makes the strategy document, in effect, a local mini-Code of Guidance. Failure to take the strategy into account where it contains material relevant to a particular decision would potentially render that decision unlawful (for failure to have regard to a relevant consideration). The strategy should certainly help officers to make decisions which are consistent with local strategic objectives.

7.185 Both documents will, of course, be relied upon by advisers assisting the homeless. They may well contain material which can be referred to when making representations on behalf of a particular applicant or in making a complaint under the local housing authority’s complaints procedure. It might be expected that the Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman¹ will ask to see copies of the current strategy when investigating homelessness complaints. Indeed, as has already been demonstrated, the review and strategy may well provide material which can be deployed (on both sides) in litigation concerning an individual applicant for homelessness assistance or a local housing authority’s policies and procedures on services for the homeless².

INTRODUCTION

8.1 Anyone seeking assistance with homelessness from a local housing authority must take the initiative and approach that local housing authority or its contracted provider of homelessness services. There is no legal duty on local housing authorities in England or Wales to seek out homeless people within their districts in order to offer their services to them. That is as true for those who are ‘vulnerable’ in housing terms\(^1\) as it is for all the homeless\(^2\).

\(^1\) See Chapter 12.

\(^2\) Note that, in England, there is a duty on certain public authorities to ask a person whom it considers may be homeless or threatened with homelessness for permission to make a referral to a local housing authority: HA 1996, s 213B, in force from 3 April 2018 although the implementation date for the specified public authorities is 1 October 2018, see 15.222–15.228. The English Code advises local housing authorities that receipt of the referral is not, in itself, a receipt of an application for homelessness assistance, but that local housing authorities should respond to the referral by trying to contact the person: English Code, para 4.19. See 15.228.
8.2 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

8.2 As this chapter explains, at the point of first contact, a local housing authority has twin responsibilities:

- to ensure that an information and advice service is available in its district for those who want help in preventing or dealing with their homelessness; and
- to receive applications made to it for accommodation (or for assistance in obtaining accommodation).

8.3 This chapter outlines the statutory requirements relating to information and advice before reviewing the considerable body of law on the treatment of applications.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE

Local housing authorities in England

8.4 Each local housing authority must make arrangements so that free information and advice is available to everyone in its district. The information and advice must cover the following topics:

- preventing homelessness;
- securing accommodation when homeless;
- the rights of people who are homeless or threatened with homelessness;
- the duties of the local housing authority under Housing Act 1996, Pt 7 (HA 1996);
- any help that is available from the local authority, whether under HA 1996, Pt 7, or otherwise for persons in the local housing authority’s district who are homeless or may become homeless (whether or not they are threatened with homelessness);
- any help that is available from anyone else for persons in the local housing authority’s district who are homeless or may become homeless (whether or not they are threatened with homelessness); and
- how to access that help.

2 HA 1996, s 179(1), as amended by HRA 2017, s 2, in force from 3 April 2018.

8.5 The information and advice must be ‘available . . . to any person in the authority’s district’ and be designed to meet the needs of all ‘persons in the authority’s district’. In addition, the service must be designed to meet the needs of particular groups of people, who are more at risk of homelessness, or more likely to experience detrimental effects if homeless. Those groups of people are:

- persons released from prison or youth detention accommodation;
- care leavers;
- former members of the regular armed forces;
- victims of domestic abuse;
- persons leaving hospital;
- persons suffering from a mental illness or impairment; and
- any other group that the local housing authority identifies as being at particular risk of homelessness in its district.\(^1\)

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 179(1) and (2) as amended by HRA 2017, s 2, in force 3 April 2018.

\(^2\) ‘Youth detention accommodation’ means ‘(a) a secure children home, (b) a secure training centre, (c) a secure college, (d) a young offender institution, (e) accommodation provided by or on behalf of a local authority for the purpose of restricting the liberty of children, (f) accommodation provided for that purpose under Children Act 1989 s 82(5), or (g) accommodation or accommodation of a description for the time being specified by order under Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 107(1)(e) (youth detention accommodation for the purposes of detention and training orders’ (HA 1996, s 179(5), inserted by HRA 2017, s 2, in force from 3 April 2018). For the circumstances in which members of this group might have a priority need, see 12.180–12.186 (England) and 12.228–12.228 (Wales).

\(^3\) ‘Care leavers’ are defined as ‘persons who are former relevant children’ within the meaning given by Children Act 1996, s 23C(1) (HA 1996, s 179(5) inserted by HRA 2017 s 2 and in force from 3 April 2018). For ‘former relevant children’ and the circumstances in which members of this group might have a priority need, see 12.160–12.179 (England) and 12.214–12.219 (Wales). For the circumstances in which care leavers (under a slightly different statutory definition) might require a local connection, see 14.95–14.103.

\(^4\) ‘Regular armed forces’ means ‘the Royal Navy, the Royal Marines, the regular army or the Royal Air Force’ (HA 1996, s 179(5) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 2, applying the definition at Armed Forces Act 2006, s 374, and in force from 3 April 2018). For the circumstances in which members of this group might have a priority need, see 12.174–12.186 (England) and 12.220–12.222 (Wales).

\(^5\) ‘Domestic abuse’ means ‘a) physical violence, b) threatening, intimidating, coercive or controlling behaviour; or c) emotional, financial, sexual or any other form of abuse, where the victim is associated with the abuser’ (HA 1996, s 179(5) inserted by HRA 2017, s 2, and in force from 3 April 2018). ‘Financial abuse’ includes ‘(a) having money or other property stolen, (b) being defrauded, (c) being put under pressure in relation to money or other property, and (d) having money or other property misused’ (HA 1996, s 179(5) inserted by HRA 2017, s 2, and in force from 3 April 2018). For the circumstances in which members of this group might have a priority need, see 10.79–10.91 (England) and 10.92–10.98 (Wales).

\(^6\) ‘Hospital’ means ‘(a) any institution for the reception and treatment of persons suffering from illness, (b) any maternity home, and (c) any institution for the reception and treatment of persons during convalescence or persons requiring medical rehabilitation, and includes clinics, dispensaries and out-patient departments maintained in connection with any such home or institution’ (HA 1996, s 179(5) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 2, applying the definition at National Health Service Act 2006, s 275(1) and in force from 3 April 2018). For the circumstances in which members of this group might have a priority need, see 12.106–12.115 (England) and 12.199–12.206 (Wales).

\(^7\) The local housing authority would be expected to identify groups in its homelessness review, see 7.97–7.126, and its homelessness strategy, see 7.127–7.178.

8.6 This duty to provide information and advice has been greatly expanded by the amendments to HA 1996, s 179, inserted by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017), s 2\(^1\). These amendments reflect an increasing concern that particular groups are not receiving appropriate services and are at greater risk of homelessness, or of suffering detrimental effects if homeless.\(^2\)

\(^2\) See, for example, Stop the scandal: an investigation into mental health and rough sleeping (St Mungo’s, 2016); and the Report of the All-Party Parliamentary Group for Ending Homelessness: Homelessness prevention for care leavers, prison leavers and survivors of domestic violence (2017).

8.7 The scope of the information and advice provided should obviously include an outline of what different housing options might be available in the
8.7 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

The information and advice should also try to address some of the common reasons why people may become homeless. Since the most common cause of homelessness is the loss of a private rented sector tenancy, information and advice to assist with financial difficulties or delays with housing benefit or universal credit payments, will be relevant. The English Code sets out eleven different issues in respect of which advice might help to prevent people from becoming threatened with homelessness. HA 1996, Pt 7, as amended by HRA 2017, contains a power for local housing authorities to give any person, or organisation, who is providing an information and advice service financial assistance, by way of grants or loans. Local housing authorities can also permit those people, or organisations, to use their premises, can provide furniture or other goods and can even make the services of local housing authority staff available.

2 English Code, para 3.7.

3 HA 1996, s 179(3), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 2, in force from 3 April 2018.

4 HA 1996, s 179(4), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 2, in force from 3 April 2018.

8.8 Local housing authorities may also assist voluntary organisations concerned with homelessness or matters relating to homelessness, by making grants or loans to them, together with allowing them to use their premises, providing furniture or other goods and even providing local housing authority staff.

1 HA 1996, s 180(1). The Secretary of State has a similar power: HA 1996, s 180(1). Assistance can only be provided if the recipient undertakes to use the money, furniture, other goods or premises for a purpose specified by the Secretary of State and also undertakes to provide any information reasonably required by the donor as to how the assistance is being used within 21 days of asked in writing to give the information. The donor must require the voluntary organisations to keep proper books of account, have them audited in any manner specified, keep records indicating how the money, furniture etc has been used and submits the books and record for inspection. If the recipient used those facilities for a different purpose, the local housing authority or Secretary of State must take steps to recover the amount provided: HA 1996, s 181.

Local housing authorities in Wales

8.9 Local housing authorities in Wales must also make arrangements for the provision of free advice and information. The Housing (Wales) Act 2014 (H(W)A 2014), Pt 2, contains specific requirements that local housing authorities in Wales must comply with. The service must include the publication of information and advice on:

- the system for making an application for homelessness assistance, and how that system operates;
- whether any other help for people who are homeless or may become homeless is available in the local housing authority’s area; and
- how to access the help that is available.

The local housing authority should also ensure that the service is designed to meet the needs of groups at particular risk of homelessness, including but not limited to:
Information and advice

- people leaving prison or youth detention accommodation;
- young people leaving care;
- people leaving the regular armed forces of the Crown;
- people leaving hospital after receiving in-patient medical treatment for mental disorder; and
- people receiving mental health services in the community.

Targeting those groups, and any other groups of people at particular risk of homelessness, should be achieved through joint working with other public authorities, voluntary organisations and any other persons.

3 H(W)A 2014, s 60(4); Welsh Code, paras 9.45–9.46.

8.10 The service must also include assistance in accessing help under the homelessness provisions of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, or any other help available for people who are homeless or may become homeless. That assistance should be available whether or not a person is threatened with homelessness within the meaning of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 and must include assistance in accessing help to prevent that person from becoming homeless.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 60(1)(b).

2 H(W)A 2014, s 60(3). See 10.144–10.147 for 'threatened with homelessness'.

8.11 The services of information, advice and assistance provided by local housing authorities in Wales may be jointly secured by two or more local housing authorities. The services may also be integrated into a local authority’s other functions of providing people with information, advice and assistance in accessing care and support.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 60(5); Welsh Code, paras 9.9–9.12, recommends collaboration with other providers.

2 H(W)A 2014, s 60(6); Social Services and Well-being (Wales) Act 2014, s 17; Welsh Code, para 9.23.

How to provide an information and advice service

8.12 The advice and information service may either be provided by the local housing authority itself, or the local housing authority may fund or otherwise support other organisations to enable them to provide the advice and information. The Welsh Code recommends that the service should be ‘impartial’. The English Code refers to ‘comprehensive, tailored advice and information’, delivered ‘in a targeted and planning way when it is most likely to be needed’.

8.13 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

8.13 Information and advice could be provided before someone has made an application for homelessness assistance\(^1\). It could also be provided once an application for homelessness assistance has been made, in performance of either of the duty to prevent or relieve homelessness\(^2\).

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 183(1); H(W)A 2014, s 62(1) see 8.4–8.19.

\(^2\) For the prevention duty, see HA 1996, s 195(2), as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, s 66 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in Wales, see 15.87–15.137 (England) and 17.45–17.72 (Wales). For the relief duty, see HA 1996, s 189B(2), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, s 73 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in Wales, see 15.138–15.195 (England) and 17.73–17.143 (Wales).

APPLICATIONS

Applying to a local housing authority

8.14 Local housing authorities are obliged to have arrangements in place so that anyone who wants to make an application for homelessness assistance can do so\(^1\). In practice, that means that there must be, at the very least, a locally accessible contact point where an applicant can make an application. Usually this will be an office of the local housing authority where applications can be made face to face and, if necessary, in private. There must also be an emergency 24-hour service enabling applications to be made and received day or night\(^2\). Local housing authorities should publicise the opening hours, address and telephone number of the homelessness service and the 24-hour emergency contact details, translate the information into any ‘main languages’ in their district, and ensure that interpreters are accessible for less frequently spoken languages\(^3\). They should ensure that emergency services, such as the police and adult care and children’s services, have details of the opening hours and contact numbers\(^4\). An application need not be directed to any particular department of the local authority\(^5\). A letter giving details of an applicant’s homelessness and containing a request for accommodation which is sent, for example, to the local housing authority’s own housing or adult care or children’s services departments should be sufficient to trigger the duty to make inquiries\(^6\).

\(^6\) R (Edwards) v Birmingham City Council [2016] EWHC 173 (Admin), [2016] HLR 11, Admin Ct per Hickinbottom J at [38].

8.15 A local housing authority’s practice of requiring an applicant for homelessness assistance to go through a ‘home options interview’ before the local housing authority accepted that the applicant had made an application and triggered duties under HA 1996, Pt 7, was conceded, by that local housing authority, to be unlawful after an applicant had brought a challenge in judicial review proceedings. The judge said:

‘the Home Options Scheme . . . cannot lawfully be used to defer consideration of a homeless application. All steps taken to avoid homelessness are of course laudable. But any such steps must be taken in parallel to the carrying out of the duty under Pt 7.’

1 R (Aweys) v Birmingham City Council [2007] EWHC 52 (Admin), [2007] HLR 27, Admin Ct. The case was later considered by the House of Lords under the name of Ali v Birmingham City Council [2009] UKHL 36, HL, but not in relation to that specific point.

Applications made to other organisations

Contracted out homelessness services

8.16 If the local housing authority has contracted out its homelessness services, applications may need to be directed to, or referred to, that contractor. No doubt the contractor will be anxious to demonstrate that its arrangements for receiving applications are at least as wide-ranging and flexible as the arrangements the local housing authority itself would have made.

8.17 Local housing authorities may choose to contract out the delivery of housing advice and information, or, indeed, the administration of part or all of their mainstream homelessness services. If they do, they remain responsible for the acts or omissions of the contractor in the exercise of the local housing authorities’ advice and homelessness functions. Local housing authorities in England cannot contract out:

• their strategic functions of drawing up homelessness strategies and reviews;
• their duty to ensure that housing information and advice is provided free to any person in their district;
• their power to fund voluntary organisations concerned with homelessness; or
• their duty to cooperate with other local housing authorities.

1 Local Authorities (Contracting Out of Allocation of Housing and Homelessness Functions) Order 1996, SI 1996/3205, as amended, at Appendix 1. See also English Code, chapter 5; Welsh Code, Annex 9; and chapter 21.

8.18 Local housing authorities in Wales can contract all of their functions under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, except their duty to cooperate with other local housing authorities: H(W)A 2014, s 951.

8.19 Local housing authorities in both England and Wales remain responsible for decisions made on applications for homelessness assistance, the performance of any duties owed and the exercise of any powers. Whilst the decisions and other functions may be contracted out, the responsibility for those decisions and their consequences remains with the local housing authority1.

See 21.1–21.2 and 21.23–21.34.

Duty on specified public authorities to refer

8.20 HA 1996, s 213B1 requires specified public authorities to notify a local housing authority in England of the details of any person in respect of whom the public authority exercises functions and whom it considers is, or may be, homeless or threatened with homelessness. The relevant public authorities are specified at reg 10 and Schedule of the Homelessness (Review Procedure etc.) Regulations 20182. They are broadly prisons, secure training centres, social services authorities and NHS Trusts3. The duty on them to refer does not come into force until 1 October 20184.

As inserted by HRA 2017, s 10, and in force from 3 April 2018 although the regulation specifying the public authorities does not come into force until 1 October 2018: Homelessness (Review Procedure etc.) Regulations 2018, SI 2018/223, reg 1(4) and 10 and Schedule. See 15.222–15.228.

The full list at Sch 1 is: a governor of a prison within the meaning of Prison Act 1952, s 53(1); a director of a contracted out prison within the meaning of Criminal Justice Act 1991, s 84(4); a governor of a young offender institution provided under Prison Act 1952, s 43(1)(a); a governor of a secure training centre provided under Prison Act 1952, s 43(1)(b); a director of a contracted out secure training centre within the meaning of Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, s 15; a principal of a secure college provided under of Prison Act 1952, s 43(1)(c); a youth offending team established under Crime and Disorder Act 1998, s 39(1); a provider of probation services, an officer designated for these purposes by the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions employed at a Jobcentre Plus office; a social services authority; a person who performs a function of a local authority pursuant to a direction under Children Act 2004, s 60, and relating to childcare by Childcare Act 2006 s 15; a NHS Trust and an NHS Foundation Trust in relation to emergency departments, urgent treatment centres and in-patient treatment; and the Secretary of State for Defence in relation to members of the regular armed forces.

Homelessness (Review Procedure etc.) Regulations 2018, SI 2018/223, regs 1(4) and 10 and Schedule.

8.21 The notification can only occur if the person has consented to the referral and has identified which local housing authority he or she would like the notification to be made to. Once or she has consented, the public authority must notify the relevant local housing authority of its opinion that the person may be homeless or may be threatened with homelessness and give details as to how that person may be contacted by the local housing authority5. Guidance as to the procedure for making and receiving the referral is at Chapter 4 of the English Code.

8.22 The English Code contains advice that the receipt of the referral ‘will not in itself constitute an application’ for homelessness assistance. Local housing authorities in England receiving the referral are advised to contact the individual being referred by phone, email or letter. If direct contact is not made, information should be provided as to how the person can access advice and assistance from the local housing authority. It advises that an application for homelessness assistance under HA 1996, s 183(1), will only be triggered if the local housing authority’s subsequent contact with the individual, after receipt of the referral, reveals details that provides it with reason to believe that he or she may be homeless or threatened with homelessness. Whilst this may be practical advice, because if the individual fails to respond to an approach, he or she may no longer wish to make an application for homelessness assistance, it is not strictly consistent with the wording of HA 1996, s 183(1). The better analysis might be that receipt of the referral constitutes an application for homelessness assistance, and that the information contained in the referral is likely to be sufficient to give the local housing authority reason to believe that the person named may be homeless or threatened with homelessness. The local housing authority’s subsequent attempt to contact him or her would be the first step in it making inquiries into whether the person is homeless or threatened with homelessness.

1 English Code, paras 4.19 and 18.7.
2 English Code, para 4.19.

To which local housing authority can an application be made?

8.23 There are 326 local housing authorities in England and 22 local housing authorities in Wales. People seeking accommodation or assistance in obtaining accommodation can apply to any local housing authority they choose, in England or in Wales. They need not fulfil any residence requirement or other preliminary condition. Indeed, applications can be made consecutively or concurrently to several local housing authorities. As it is not necessary to make an application in person, applications can be directed to widely dispersed local housing authorities.

2 See 8.55–863.

8.24 The statutory scheme is obviously based on the premise that the applicant will apply to the local housing authority for the area in which he or she wishes to be accommodated. Not surprisingly, therefore, if the local housing authority to which the application is made decides to accept and perform the HA 1996, s 189B(2), or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty to help the applicant to secure accommodation or the HA 1996, s 193(2), or H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty by providing accommodation in its area, the applicant has no redress against that decision, even if he or she would have preferred to have been referred to a different local housing authority for it to perform that duty.\(^5\)
8.24 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

---

\(^1\) As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; see 15.138–15.195.

\(^2\) See 17.73–17.143.

\(^3\) See 16.94–16.199.

\(^4\) See 17.146–17.199.

8.25 It is notorious that local housing authorities have different approaches to the strictness with which they apply homelessness legislation. In areas of acute housing shortage, applicants must expect the law to be tightly applied. In areas where there is a surplus of housing accommodation available, applicants may find that their applications receive very little scrutiny and promptly result in the acceptance of the main housing duty.

8.26 Those considering making applications could therefore often benefit from early advice as to the appropriate local housing authority to approach with an application. If their home local housing authority takes a very strict approach to applications, they may be better advised to apply to a more generous local housing authority in the hope that the duties will be promptly accepted and then referred back to their home area.\(^1\)

\(^1\) Under the ‘local connection’ provisions described in Chapter 14.

8.27 Indeed, the different tests in HA 1996, Pt 7, and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, in relation to the definition of priority need\(^2\), might render it advantageous for an applicant to direct an application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in one jurisdiction in the hope that he or she might benefit from the different test.

8.28 Of course, if an applicant is worried that he or she might be found to have ‘become homeless intentionally’\(^3\), then there is every advantage in the applicant considering which local housing authority should receive his or her application. From 1 July 2015, local housing authorities in Wales can only have regard to the ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ test if they have made a specific decision to have regard to that test and have specified the categories of applicant to whom the test might be directed.\(^4\) It follows that an applicant might wish to consider the advantages of applying to a local housing authority in Wales, rather than to a local housing authority in England. He or she could also consider to which local housing authority in Wales to apply.\(^5\)

\(^3\) A local housing authority in Wales will have published a notice if it has decided to stop having regard to whether or not applicants falling within certain specified categories have become homeless intentionally: H(W)A 2014, s 78(3), see 17.17–17.23.
Applications 8.32

8.29 There is no eligibility condition or geographic connection required to make an application. The local housing authority cannot therefore turn away applicants who appear to have just arrived in the UK from overseas, or those who seem to have no local connection with its district (even if they have an obvious and current connection with the district of another local housing authority) or anyone else. The proper course, if an applicant does not appear to have a local connection with the local housing authority’s district, is for the local housing authority to make the usual inquiries into:

(1) whether the applicant is ‘eligible’ for assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7, or for ‘help’ under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2; and

(2) if so, whether any duty is owed under HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, to the applicant.
1 As amended by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

8.30 The scope of those inquiries may (but does not need to) include considering whether the applicant has a local connection with the local housing authority and, if not, whether he or she has a local connection elsewhere.
1 HA 1996, s 184(2). There is no equivalent provision in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, but the local housing authority has a discretion whether or not to make a referral: H(W)A 2014, s 80(1) and (2). This implies that it also has a discretion whether or not to make inquiries into local connection, as confirmed by Welsh Code, para 18.1. For further discussion of local connection see 14.26–14.34.

8.31 A local housing authority in England must also accept an application for homelessness assistance made by an applicant who had previously accepted a private rented sector offer, made by a different local housing authority, in the first local housing authority’s area. If the application is made within two years of acceptance of the private rented sector offer, the special provisions at HA 1996, s 195A will apply.
1 For ‘private rented sector offer’ see HA 1996, s 193(7AA) and 16.161–16.180.

8.32 The local housing authority in England to which the applicant has applied must accept the application, secure interim accommodation if required, make inquiries and notify the applicant of its decision as to whether any duty is owed. If the applicant is owed the HA 1996, 189B(2), relief duty or the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty, the local housing authority can then refer the applicant to the local housing authority which made him or her the private rented sector offer.
1 The duty at HA 1996, s 188(1A) (as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(4), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018).

4 HA 1996, s 198(A1) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(8) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018), (1) and (2ZA); see 15.139–15.142.

Form in which an application can be made

8.33 Whenever a person approaches a local housing authority for accommodation, or for assistance in obtaining accommodation, and the local housing authority has reason to believe that he or she may be homeless or threatened with homelessness, then he or she has made an application for homelessness assistance. Indeed, it is the authors’ view that receipt by a local housing authority in England of a referral made by a public authority under the HA 1996, s 213B, duty is sufficient for a person to have made an application for homelessness assistance.

1 HA 1996, s 183; H(W)A 2014, s 62(1).

2 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 10, in force from 3 April 2018, see 8.20–8.22 and 15.222–15.228.

8.34 Although it may be convenient for a local housing authority to have its own application form for applicants to complete, there is no legal requirement that an application should be in writing or in any specified form. An application could perfectly properly be made in person, by letter, fax, telephone, text or email. So long as the communication seeks accommodation or assistance in obtaining accommodation and sets out an account that gives the local housing authority reason to believe that the person might be homeless or threatened with homelessness, it constitutes an application. As the Codes make clear, there is absolutely no requirement on applicants to specify that they are seeking services under HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

Obviously, there is room for possible disagreement as to whether what is said in the course of a conversation constitutes an application. In R v Cherwell District Council ex p Howkins, the applicant’s solicitor telephoned the local housing authority shortly after it had evicted the applicant (who had been a council tenant) for rent arrears. The judge was quite satisfied that an application for homelessness assistance did not need to be in writing. He said that:

‘... in order to be treated as an application it seems to me that an oral conversation has to be conducted in such a way that it is clear that it amounts to an application.’

Consequently, on the facts, the conversation had simply been an inquiry by the solicitor as to whether the local housing authority was going to offer temporary accommodation and was not itself an application for any accommodation.

1 English Code, para 18.5; Welsh Code, paras 10.7–10.8; R v Chiltern District Council ex p Roberts (1990) 23 HLR 387, QBD; and R (Aweys) v Birmingham City Council [2007] EWHC 52 (Admin), [2007] HLR 27, Admin Ct per Collins J at [8]. The case was later considered by the House of Lords under the name of Ali v Birmingham City Council [2009].
Applications 8.39

Local housing authorities should take particular care to identify when someone may appear only to be applying for an allocation of social housing, but is actually indicating that he or she might be homeless according to the definitions at HA 1996, Pt 7\(^1\), or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2\(^2\). Where the information on an inquiry about the allocation scheme, or on an application for an allocation, gives the local housing authority ‘reason to believe’ that the applicant might be homeless, that approach is also an application for homelessness assistance. The courts and the Ombudsmen have criticised local housing authorities who have failed to recognise such applications\(^3\).

---

8.35 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

8.36 Once an application meeting the above (fairly minimal) requirements is received, the local housing authority cannot ignore it until the applicant has completed the local housing authority’s standard application form. It must act upon the application and start to make inquiries.

‘Actual’ and ‘deemed’ applications

8.37 The regime for homelessness assistance does not recognise the concept of an implied, constructive or deemed homelessness application. The only application which counts, and triggers the duty to make inquiries, is one actually made.

8.38 This can be a source of frustration for a local housing authority that is seeking to free itself from responsibility for particularly problematic tenants. It is not uncommon for tenants, in both the social housing and the private rented sectors, who are facing eviction for rent arrears or persistent anti-social behaviour, to be forewarned that the local housing authority will not accept a responsibility for rehousing them once evicted. If the tenant potentially has a priority need, and chooses to refrain from making a homelessness application until the moment of eviction (or very shortly beforehand), it is likely that the local housing authority will have to provide further accommodation, at least until the local housing authority can notify the applicant that it is satisfied that he or she does not have a priority need\(^1\).

8.39 For this reason, some local housing authorities have in the past tried to explore a concept of an implied or deemed application made well before the eviction, allowing them to undertake inquiries while the tenants are still in their homes (and awaiting the bailiffs) and thus reducing any temporary accommodation responsibility to an absolute minimum. However, it seems that (very properly) this device has been abandoned.
8.39 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

Who can make an application?

8.40 Anyone can make a request for accommodation or for assistance in obtaining accommodation. If that person does not appear to be homeless or threatened with homelessness, he or she will be entitled to housing information and advice, free of charge, but the local housing authority will owe no further duty\(^1\). If the person appears to be homeless or to be threatened with homelessness, the local housing authority must treat the request as an application for homelessness assistance and start to make inquiries\(^2\).

1 HA 1996, s 179(1) as amended by HRA 2017, s 2, in force from 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, s 60(1)(a), see 8.4–8.13.

2 HA 1996, s 183(1) and English Code, paras 18.6 and 18.32; H(W)A 2014, s 62(1) and Welsh Code, paras 10.6–10.9.

8.41 There is no eligibility condition or geographic connection required in order to make an application. The local housing authority cannot therefore turn away applicants who appear to have just arrived in the UK from overseas, nor those who seem to have no local connection with its district (even if they have an obvious and current connection with the district of another local housing authority)\(^1\).

1 See Chapter 14 or ‘local connection’.

8.42 A person must have legal capacity in order to make an application for homeless assistance. Accordingly, those who lack the mental capacity to make an application cannot apply\(^1\). It is for the local housing authority, in the first instance, to decide whether the applicant has the mental capacity to make an application\(^2\). There is no right of statutory review or appeal if the application is refused on the basis of lack of capacity. The obvious practical route to achieving a reversal of the local housing authority’s decision would be the submission of clear medical evidence that the applicant did have capacity. If the local housing authority persisted in its refusal to accept the application, proceedings for judicial review would need to be brought\(^3\).

1 R v Oldham Metropolitan Borough Council ex p Garlick, R v London Borough of Tower Hamlets ex p Begum [1993] AC 509, HL; R (MT) v Oxford City Council [2015] EWHC 795 (Admin), (2015) May Legal Action, p 45, Admin Ct and, most recently, WB v W District Council [2018] EWCA Civ 928, CA. A local authority which has adult care responsibilities would almost certainly have duties under the Care Act 2014 (England) or Social Services and Well Being Act 2014 (Wales) towards someone who attempted to make an application for homelessness assistance but did not have the capacity to do so. Those duties can include the provision of accommodation. See 20.19–20.38 (England) and 20.72–20.84 (Wales).

2 It is presumed that capacity to make an application for homelessness assistance should be assessed applying the principles at Mental Capacity Act 2005, ss 1–3 and thus presumption was applied in WB v W District Council [2018] EWCA Civ 928, CA.

3 See R (Halewood) v West Lancashire District Council [2009] May 2010 Legal Action, p 24, where the local housing authority had decided that the claimant lacked capacity. Judicial review proceedings were subsequently compromised when the claimant produced new evidence. See 19.306–19.333 for judicial review.

8.43 There is no minimum age for applicants. In the absence of a statutory minimum age, the House of Lords has, in dealing with an application made by a 4-year old, held that applications from ‘dependent’ children should not be considered. There is no statutory definition of that term. It follows that an application may be made by any child who is no longer ‘dependent’. As the House of Lords recognised:

‘There will obviously be the case from time to time when a child leaves home under the age of 16 and ceases to be dependent on the parents or those with whom he or she was living.’

1 English Code, para 18.8. The Welsh Code states ‘applications can be made by anyone 16 or over’ (Welsh Code, para 10.7) although arguably a person younger than 16 is not excluded from making an application if he or she has capacity to do so.
2 R v Oldham Metropolitan Borough Council ex p Garlick [1993] AC 509, HL.
3 The English Code contains advice from the Secretary of State: ‘local housing authorities may wish to treat as dependent all children under 16, and all children aged 16–18 who are in, or are about to begin, full-time education or training or who for other reasons are unable to support themselves and who live at home . . . The Secretary of State considers that it will be very rare that a 16 or 17-year-old child who is living at home will not be considered to be dependent.’ (English Code, para 8.7); Welsh Code para 16.6 is less explicit; see 12.53 and 12.198. The Secretary of State’s advice should be taken into account but should not be read as meaning that children 16 or 17 are always dependent on their parents.
4 [1993] AC 509, HL at 517 per Lord Griffiths.

8.44 Such an individual can make his or her own application. Applicants need not show a history of independence from their parents or others. Plainly, the very first step that an applicant may have taken to demonstrate that he or she is no longer ‘dependent’ might be making the application.

1 See 12.41–12.75 (England) and 12.198 (Wales) for ‘dependent children’. See also R (SD) v Oxford City Council [2015] EWHC 1871 (Admin), [2015] October Legal Action, Admin Ct where exactly that scenario occurred: a 16-year-old boy made an application for homelessness assistance after each of his parents had been found to have become homeless intentionally; Ouseley J refused permission to apply for judicial review, holding that, whilst it had not been appropriate for the local housing authority to refuse to accept an application, the claimant could not conceivably be in priority need since that category of priority need was directed to non-dependent children.

8.45 There are occasionally applications made by non-dependent young people under the age of 16, but applications by those aged 16 or 17 are more common. Since 1 March 2001 in Wales and 31 July 2002 in England, most 16- and 17-year-olds have been designated as being in priority need. Guidance suggests that local housing authorities should have arrangements in place so that, when applications for homelessness assistance are received from 16- or 17-year-olds, assessments of their housing, care and support needs are carried out jointly with children’s services and that the principal responsibility falls upon children’s services. Obviously, unless the local housing authority is a unitary authority, the consent of the young person will be required before his or her details are disclosed to the children’s services department of a different authority.

1 For an example, see Kelly v Monklands District Council [1985] Lexis Citation 24, 1986 SLT 165, CtSess.
8.45 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

Homelessness (Priority Need for Accommodation) (England) Order 2002, SI 2002/2051, art 3; H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(f). Until 2002, around 3–4,000 applicants in England each year were accepted as homeless and having priority need due to their vulnerability as young people. The number rose to 11,050 in 2003–04 and then fell to 4,070 in 2008/09. It has since fallen even further, to 1,030 in 2016–17 presumably as a result of more young people being accepted as children in need and accommodated by children’s services under the Children Act 1989 duties, see 12.133–12.159 and 20.58–20.64 (MHCLG, Homelessness Statistics, Table 773). Similarly, in Wales in 2004–05, 970 children were accepted as homeless and having a priority need due to their being aged 16 or 17. The numbers declined from 2005 onwards. The Welsh Government no longer collates figures on acceptances by different categories of priority need. See 12.133–12.159 (England) and 12.212–12.213 (Wales).

8.46 Both the courts and the Ombudsmen have been extremely critical of local authorities passing 16- and 17-year-olds between housing departments and children’s services departments, with neither agency accepting a statutory duty to the young person. In one case, the Local Government Ombudsman found two councils guilty of maladministration where a 16-year-old homeless boy spent nine months sleeping in a tent or occasionally on friends’ sofas because neither council had complied with its statutory duty to secure accommodation for him.

Joint applications

8.47 The law does not recognise an application for accommodation, or for assistance in obtaining accommodation, made by a couple, a family or a household. Applications are made by individuals. Both HA 1996, Pt 7, and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, refer to ‘a person’ making the application. One judge has said:

‘I am quite unable to conclude that an application for housing as a homeless person falls to be treated as being made by a family unit. It is, and must be, an application at the instance of an individual. Of course, if that individual is residing with others in a family, that will affect the accommodation he requires, and whether he has priority need, but it does not alter the fact that the application is the application of an individual.’

8.48 Of course, there is nothing to prevent more than one individual in the same household from making an application. Indeed, several applicants from a single household may apply at the same time to the same local housing authority and even on the same application form. This is particularly common where there are two adult heads of household and both choose to apply.

8.49 There is some helpful judicial guidance on how to deal with such jointly made applications:

‘It seems to me that where the application which is made to the authority is, as here, a joint application, it is a joint application which the authority must determine. If there is no request by one of two joint applicants for his or her case to be treated separately, there is no obligation upon the authority to deal with the application as being other than a joint application. However, in considering the joint application there may be an obligation on the housing authority to consider the separate circumstances of the individuals who are making the joint application.’

1 R v Wandsworth London Borough Council ex p Lord (unreported) 8 July 1985, QBD per Woolf J.

8.50 In Hemans v Windsor and Maidenhead Royal Borough Council, the application for homelessness assistance had been made by solicitors acting for both husband and wife and had been expressed as a ‘joint application’. There was some discussion before the Court of Appeal as to what that meant. One member of the Court of Appeal said:

‘We were referred to the provision in the Interpretation Act 1978 that, unless the contrary intention appears, the singular includes the plural. In practice, joint homelessness applications are common. It is also common ground that in such cases, the council must look at the circumstances of both or all the applicants. In the vast majority of cases, it will make no practical difference whether technically it is to be regarded as a single application capable only of a single determination or two applications in a single document. I would leave further discussion of that arcane point until such time as a case may arise where it matters.

8.51 In practice, this judicial guidance enables local housing authorities to proceed on the basis that there is an identity of interest between the joint applicants unless and until material before the local housing authority indicates that separate consideration of each application is required. Such material could be a disagreement between the joint applicants in the course of interviews with the local housing authority or might be implied from the giving of mutually inconsistent accounts. The safer course must ordinarily be to treat even joint applicants with a degree of separate consideration.

8.52 This sense, in which even supposed joint applications are simply two applications contained in one single form, was emphasised in Lewis v Brent London Borough Council. Mr and Mrs Lewis had applied together for homelessness assistance to the local housing authority. However, Mrs Lewis was unable to rely on her husband’s circumstances in an appeal against a decision that she had become homeless intentionally. Although they had made a joint application, he was not a party to the appeal and so his – more favourable – circumstances could not be relied upon by her.

8.53 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

8.53 Where more than one individual in a household could apply, it may be sensible for one rather than the other to make the application. For example, one may be eligible for assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, and the other may not be eligible; one may have a priority need and the other may not; or one may be more likely to be found to have become homeless intentionally. There may even be an advantage in applicants in similar circumstances making consecutive applications in order to obtain not only the possibility of a second, and more favourable decision, but also to obtain at least a further period in interim accommodation whilst the second application is considered. Where the application is a re-application for homelessness assistance, made within two years of the acceptance of a private rented sector offer made to the applicant by a local housing authority in England in order to bring the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty to an end, the special provisions in HA 1996, s 195A will only apply if the application is made by the same person who had accepted the private rented sector offer and is made to a local housing authority in England.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 This is relevant where the application for homelessness assistance is to a local housing authority in England and one person has a form of priority need that is at HA 1996, s 189(1)(d) or one of those listed in the Homelessness (Priority Need for Accommodation) (England) Order 2002, SI 2002/2051 because each of those categories require that the applicant must have the requisite priority need. In the case of priority need acquired under one of the categories at HA 1996, s 189(1)(a)–(c), and all applications to local housing authorities in Wales under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, the applicant has a priority need if either he or she, or a member of his or her household, has the requisite characteristics.

3 See R (SD) v Oxford City Council [2015] EWHC 1871 (Admin), (2015) October Legal Action, Admin Ct where Ouseley J refused permission to bring a judicial review claim and an interim injunction requiring the provision of accommodation for a 16-year-old boy who had made an application for homelessness assistance after each of his parents had made applications and had been found to have become homeless intentionally, see 8.42–8.44.

4 HA 1996, s 193(7AA)–(7AC), see 16.161–16.180 for ‘private rented sector offer’.

5 As amended by HRA 2017, s 4(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

8.54 Where an application by one adult member of a household results in the acceptance of the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty, or accommodation duties owed under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, accommodation will be provided for the whole household. What happens, however, if the applying adult rejects that offer and the other household members then make further applications? This occurred in R v Camden London Borough Council ex p Hersi. In that case, the new applicant was a 19-year-old daughter of the first applicant, her own mother. After the mother had rejected an offer of accommodation, the local housing authority refused to accept the daughter’s application. The Court of Appeal described the daughter as having ‘no standing’ to apply for homelessness assistance for the whole family (although the reasoning seems to suggest that this was because the younger children of the household were dependent on their mother and not on her). However, in that case Camden accepted (correctly) that the new application been from another adult member of the household on whom the children were dependent, inquiries into that application would need to have been made.

1 See 16.94–16.199.

Multiple applications

8.55 There is nothing to prevent someone applying simultaneously to more than one local housing authority. Local housing authorities normally require an applicant for homelessness assistance to declare all recent or current applications for homelessness assistance made to other local housing authorities. Where there are concurrent applications to different local housing authorities, each local housing authority will be obliged to carry out its own inquiries, potentially resulting in a wasteful duplication of effort. As a result, both Codes suggest that the receiving local housing authorities should agree amongst themselves which one will be responsible for carrying out inquiries. Presumably this is on the basis that the local housing authority which does undertake the inquiries does so both on its own behalf and as agent for (or delegate of) the others. Each local housing authority should then make its own assessment of the results of the inquiries and reach its own decision. It seems implicit in this suggested arrangement, however, that in practice the applicant will withdraw all other applications as soon as one of the local housing authorities accepts that it owes the applicant any duty under HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

Consecutive applications

8.56 As already stated, there is nothing to prevent an applicant applying first to one local housing authority and then to another. When an applicant has previously applied to one local housing authority (the first local housing authority), the second or subsequent local housing authority would normally seek the applicant’s consent so that it is free (in the course of making inquiries into the second or subsequent application) to contact the first local housing authority and request information on the application made and on that local housing authority’s decision (if any) on that application. The first local housing authority is under a duty to cooperate with any such request.

8.57 The second local housing authority, however, must not rely solely on the first local housing authority’s decision in reaching its own decision on the application made to it, although it may take that decision into account. Nor may it merely adopt the first local housing authority’s decision. It must make its own independent inquiries and reach an independent decision on the application it has received.

2 As permitted by Local Government Act 1972, s 101(1)(b).

4 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in England made on or after 3 April 2018.
8.58 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

8.58 It may well be that the second local housing authority reaches a different decision from the first local housing authority. For example, it may decide that the applicant is owed a duty because he or she is eligible, even if the first local housing authority had decided that matter against the applicant¹.

¹ As occurred in R (Sambotin) v Brent London Borough Council [2017] EWHC 1190 (Admin), [2017] HLR 31, Admin Ct, where Waltham Forest London Borough Council had notified the applicant of its decision that he was not eligible for assistance. On a further application for homelessness assistance to Brent London Borough Council, Brent notified him of its s 184(1) decision that he was eligible, and that the conditions for referral were met, so that he would be referred to Waltham Forest. Brent subsequently attempted to re-open its s 184 decision. The Administrative Court judge held that a s 184(1) decision could only be re-opened in the event of fraud on the part of the applicant, or where the local housing authority which had made the decision had proceeded from a fundamental mistake of fact. See 14.182.

8.59 Since local housing authorities in Wales now have a choice whether or not to apply the ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ test, an applicant who has been found to have become homeless intentionally is likely to be advised to consider directing a second application to a local housing authority in Wales which has not decided to have regard to the test¹.

¹ H(W)A 2014, s 78, see 17.17–17.26. A local housing authority in Wales will have published a notice if it has decided to stop having regard to whether or not applicants failing within certain specified categories have become homeless intentionally; H(W)A 2014, s 78(3).

8.60 The second local housing authority may also decide that the HA 1996, s 189B(2)¹, relief duty or HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty² is to be referred to the first local housing authority on the grounds that the conditions for referral in HA 1996, s 198³ are satisfied. This can result in the first local housing authority being obliged to receive back and accommodate an applicant to whom it had previously notified an adverse decision⁴.

¹ As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications to local housing authorities in England made on or after 3 April 2018, see 15.138–15.195.
² Or, for local housing authorities in Wales, the H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty, see 17.146–17.199.
³ Or, for local housing authorities in Wales, under H(W)A 2014, s 80, see 14.32.

8.61 A dispute resolution mechanism is available where there is disagreement between two local housing authorities as to whether the conditions for referral are met. However, that mechanism does not apply in cases where there is no dispute over the local connection conditions, but where the local housing authority to whom the applicant has been referred does not agree with the referring local housing authority’s decision that a duty to accommodate is owed to the applicant. In those circumstances, the first local housing authority cannot refuse to accept the referral unless it can successfully demonstrate, in the usual way, that the conditions for referral are not satisfied⁵.

8.62 If the first local housing authority believes that the second local housing authority has incorrectly reached a decision that the main duty is owed to the applicant, it cannot simply refuse the referral of the duty and wait for the applicant or the second local housing authority to bring legal proceedings. Instead, it must take the initiative and bring judicial review proceedings to demonstrate that the decision-making by the second local housing authority was unlawful. Obviously, the second local housing authority must apply the law correctly when making its inquiries and reaching its decision. If it has not done so, the first local housing authority will succeed in having the decision overturned. In R v Newham London Borough Council ex p Tower Hamlets London Borough Council, the Court of Appeal held that Newham would have been entitled to find that it owed the main housing duty to someone whom Tower Hamlets had previously found to have become homeless intentionally. Newham would have been, had it applied the law correctly, entitled to refer the applicant back to Tower Hamlets under the local connection provisions. However, Newham made an error of law when considering whether the applicant had become homeless intentionally, in that it took into account its own local housing conditions rather than those of Tower Hamlets. Tower Hamlets succeeded in having the Newham decision, and consequently the referral, set aside.

2 English Code, para 10.45.

8.63 In R (Kensington & Chelsea Royal London Borough Council) v Ealing London Borough Council, the applicant had first made an earlier application for homelessness assistance to Ealing London Borough Council, which had accepted that it owed her the main housing duty and made her an offer of accommodation. She had refused the offer and so the main housing duty owed to her by Ealing had come to an end. She made then made a new application for homelessness assistance to Kensington & Chelsea Royal London Borough Council, which made inquiries into the reason why she had refused Ealing’s offer of accommodation and concluded that she had not become homeless intentionally and that a main housing duty was owed. Since she had no local connection with Kensington & Chelsea, it referred the main housing duty to Ealing under the conditions of referral. Ealing refused to accept the referral, arguing that its main housing duty towards the applicant had come to an end. The judge held that Ealing’s earlier discharge did not permit it to refuse the referral. Ealing had not sought argue to that Kensington & Chelsea had made an error of law in its decision-making. It could not therefore refuse the referral.

Applications from owners and tenants

8.64 It is not necessary for someone to be physically without a roof over his or her head in order to make an application for accommodation (or for assistance in obtaining accommodation) which requires consideration under HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. An applicant cannot be treated as having accommodation unless it is accommodation which it would be reasonable for him or her to continue to occupy. Such an applicant may be a freehold owner, long leaseholder or tenant who gives the local housing authority some reason to believe that it is no longer reasonable for him or her to continue occupying the present accommodation. The concept of reasonable continued occupation is discussed in detail elsewhere, but obvious examples of those who may be homeless include owners or tenants who might be victims of domestic violence, who cannot afford their accommodation, or who experience gross overcrowding or other adverse physical conditions.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 HA 1996, s 175(3); H(W)A 2014, s 55(3).
3 See 10.73–10.134.
4 HA 1996, s 177(1), see 10.79–10.91; H(W)A 2014, s 57(1), see 10.79–10.80 and 10.97–10.98. Such a scenario occurred in the LGO investigation into complaint against Wiltshire Council, 12 011 081, 16 July 2013, (2013) November Legal Action, p 32, although on the facts and the law at that time, Wiltshire Council had not made an error when it concluded that the applicant was not likely to be subject to violence or domestic violence if she continued to occupy her accommodation.

The Local Government Ombudsman found maladministration where a council tenant, having decided that it was no longer reasonable for her to continue to occupy her accommodation, tried to make an application for homelessness assistance and the local housing authority informed her that, as a secure council tenant, she was unable to make an application: Complaint against Croydon London Borough Council, 14 016 826, 8 January 2016 (2016) June Legal Action, p 42.

5 Local housing authorities need particular sensitivity to this type of application where an applicant is an existing tenant of that local housing authority. Local housing authorities should be aware that an application for alternative accommodation from one of their existing tenants might, in reality, be an application for homelessness assistance if the tenant is saying that it is not reasonable for him or her to continue to occupy the existing home. Generally, a local housing authority is entitled to presume that an application for a transfer from one of its existing tenants is exactly that – an application for a transfer – rather than an application under HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. However, where, from the circumstances of the application, it is clear that the tenant is saying that it is not reasonable for him or her to continue in occupation, the local housing authority would be in breach of its statutory duty if it treated the application as a simple application for a transfer rather than also as an application for HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, assistance. An obvious example, where a tenant apparently seeking a transfer is in fact asserting that his or her existing accommodation is not reasonable to continue to occupy, is where the tenant is complaining that he or she has to be transferred because of violence or harassment. It is not necessary for the applicant to spell out that the application should be considered under HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. Where the applicant is complaining about the condition of his or her property, the local housing authority should consider carefully whether it has reason to believe that the accommodation... might not be reasonable to continue to occupy, or whether the property could be repaired and it would not be unreasonable to expect the tenant to continue to live in the property until the remedial works have been carried out. If the latter is the case, the low threshold at HA 1996, 183(1), will not be met.

In these seven linked cases, tenants were accepted to be homeless because their tenancies were so overcrowded that it was not reasonable for them, and all the members of their households, to continue to occupy. See 10.122–10.123.

8.66 Local housing authorities must take exactly the same approach with applications from those who are not existing local housing authority tenants but who apply for accommodation under the local housing authority’s ordinary housing allocation scheme. A private sector tenant applying for long-term council accommodation (or for nomination to a private registered provider in England or a registered social landlord in Wales) who writes, on his or her application form, that the application must be considered urgently because the present home is grossly overcrowded, unfit for occupation, or is for some other reason no longer suitable to occupy, must likewise be the subject of inquiries under HA 1996, Pt 6, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. In Bury Metropolitan Borough Council v Gibbons, the applicant had completed an application form for HA 1996, Pt 6 accommodation in which he stated that he could not afford his rent and had to move out of his home 15 days later when the notice expired. The Court of Appeal held that the HA 1996, Pt 6 housing application disclosed information triggering an obligation on the local housing authority to make inquiries and, had it done so, it would have concluded that Mr Gibbons was threatened with homelessness and that it owed him a duty to provide advice and assistance. Self-evidently that information was sufficient to give the local housing authority reason to believe that the applicant may be homeless. The applicant did not need to spell out that he or she was applying for consideration under both HA 1996, Pt 6 and under HA 1996, Pt 7, or

Warnings

8.67 It is a criminal offence for an applicant knowingly or recklessly to make a false statement in order to induce the local housing authority to believe that he or she is entitled to accommodation or homelessness assistance. It is also a criminal offence for the applicant knowingly to withhold information reasonably required by the local housing authority, or to fail to notify the local housing authority of any change of facts material to his or her case1. Local housing authorities are obliged to explain the duty to notify any change of facts, and what that means, to each applicant, in ordinary language, and are encouraged to explain it in a sensitive way, in order to avoid intimidating applicants2. Where a person can show that the explanation was not given, or that there is some other reasonable excuse for non-compliance, no offence will have been committed3.

8.68 For local housing authorities in Wales, if a mistake of fact is discovered after a duty has been accepted, then, in addition to any possible criminal offences committed, the duty will come to an end1. Obviously the ‘mistake of fact’ might be an innocent mistake by the applicant or by someone else, in which case the duty will come to an end, but there will not have been any criminal offences committed.

A local housing authority’s immediate duties

8.69 As soon as a local housing authority has reason to believe that a person who has made an application may be homeless or threatened with homelessness, it is obliged to make inquiries into whether the person is eligible for assistance and, if so, whether any duty is owed to him or her under the homelessness provisions1. The duty to make inquiries cannot be postponed2. However, the inquiries could be taken in stages. Since the immediate issue for a local housing authority will be whether a HA 1996, s 195(2)\(^3\) or H(W)A 2014, s 66(1)\(^6\) prevention duty, or a HA 1996, s 189B(2)\(^5\) or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1)\(^4\) relief duty will be owed, those issues could be determined first. The issues of priority need and whether or not the applicant may have become homeless intentionally could be inquired into at a later stage.

8.70 There have been a number of findings of maladministration by the Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman against local housing authorities in England which, instead of considering whether applicants were homeless or might be threatened with homelessness, refused to make inquiries, told applicants that they would not be helped (thereby pre-judging the result of inquiries), or told them that they should make their own accommodation arrangements\(^1\). The Local Government and Social Care Ombudsmen have indicated that it is essential to good administration that all applicants receive equal treatment, and that their applications are given fair consideration and are properly investigated before decisions are reached\(^2\). The Public Services Ombudsman for Wales has taken the same approach\(^3\).

8.70 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

8.71 Indeed, both Ombudsmen were so concerned at local housing authorities’ failure to comply with their statutory duties, that each one issued a report into those failings. In 2006, the Public Services Ombudsman for Wales published *Housing Allocations and Homelessness: A Special Report by the Local Government Ombudsman for Wales*¹ in which he said ‘I have found . . . shortcomings in the manner in which some authorities deal with applicants who approach them claiming to be homeless. Recording practices were found to be wanting as well as in some instances the quality of inquiries and decision making.’

8.72 In 2011, the Local Government Ombudsman published Homelessness: how councils can ensure justice for homeless people Focus Report: learning the lessons from complaints¹. In the Focus Report, the Ombudsman said:

‘Complaints to the Local Government Ombudsman suggest that people who face homelessness do not always receive the help that they are entitled to from councils. Other organisations have coined the phrase “gatekeeping” to describe where councils refuse to accept a homelessness application or to provide interim accommodation where there is no legitimate reason . . . We know that councils are currently under pressure with limited resources and increasing numbers of people presenting as homeless. To avoid more people suffering personal injustice councils should always properly apply the law in practice.’

8.73 Given the absolute duty to make inquiries and, in some cases, to secure interim accommodation when an application for homelessness assistance is made¹, it is essential that local housing authority staff in direct contact with the public are well trained and can recognise and receive applications and ensure that inquiries are put in hand. Far too often, applicants are wrongly turned away by busy or inexperienced reception staff. It is not unknown for applicants to be told:

- ‘you need to apply to a different local housing authority’;
- ‘we do not take homelessness applications from our own tenants’;
- ‘we only help the priority homeless here’;
- ‘we cannot help because you have made yourself homeless intentionally’; or
- ‘please return with a passport and proof of employment’².

All of these responses to an application, and any other similar statements, are wrong in law.

Applications 8.75

8.74 In January 2015, Shelter Cymru published its Equal Ground Standard following consultation with service users and those delivering homelessness services. The Welsh Code advises that local housing authorities in Wales should adopt its recommendations which contain useful standards on treating applicants with respect and with as much openness as possible, so that applicants are equally open and honest.

1 Equal Ground Standard, a guide to the service user standard for Welsh homelessness services (2015, Shelter Cymru).

A local housing authority’s first decision: interim accommodation

8.75 The very first issue that a local housing authority must consider when it has received an application for homelessness assistance is whether it has reason to believe that an applicant may be homeless, eligible for assistance and have a priority need. If the local housing authority does have reason to believe that the applicant may fall into all of these categories and the application for homelessness assistance cannot be inquired into and concluded that day, it must provide accommodation for the applicant and his or her household pending notification of a decision on the application. That duty cannot be postponed. The threshold trigger is very low: the local housing authority need only have ‘reason to believe’ that the applicant ‘may be’ homeless, ‘may be’ eligible for assistance and ‘may’ have a priority need. Both Codes remind local housing authorities that ‘having reason to believe’ is a lower test than ‘being satisfied’. If in doubt, interim accommodation should be provided.

1 A local housing authority in England will not need to consider whether it has reason to believe that an applicant may have a priority need if the applicant is making a new application for homelessness assistance within two years of having accepted a private rented sector offer from a local housing authority: HA 1996, ss 188(1A) and 195A, see 8.100–8.107 and 16.47–16.50.
2 In one case, a judge said that an applicant had ‘a highly arguable case that no s 184 inquiry was ever conducted’ where the local housing authority had issued what purported to be a decision made under HA 1996, s 184(3) on the same day as the applicant had made his application for homelessness assistance: R (IA) v Westminster City Council [2013] EWHC 1273 (Admin), (2013) July/August Legal Action, p 23, Admin Ct.

where a homeless 16-year-old had had to sleep in a tent, and occasionally on friends’ sofa, for nine months: Complaints against Kent County Council, 09 017 510 and Dover District Council, 09 017 512, 31 July 2012, (2012) October Legal Action, p 36. A Serious Case Review in respect of ‘Robert’ by North Yorkshire Safeguarding Adult Board, November 2012, was an investigation into the circumstances of the death of a long-term rough sleeper (‘Robert’ who had died after two local housing authorities had failed to secure interim accommodation for him.

8.76 It was suggested in one case that a local housing authority was encouraging its officers to make decisions on applications for homelessness assistance on the same day as the application was received, so that the duty to secure interim accommodation in HA 1996, s 188(1) would not arise. The judge said:

‘there is no doubt that a blanket “same day” policy, which requires a decision on the homeless application and, in consequence, the interim accommodation all in one day would be unlawful . . . it would only be “in the most straightforward of cases that a decision can be reached on the same day as the application itself”’.

Repeat applications

8.77 There is no bar on someone who has made an earlier application for homelessness assistance, and had that application determined by the local housing authority, from re-applying to the same local housing authority for accommodation (or assistance in obtaining accommodation) at any later time.

1 English Code, para 18.11.

Local housing authorities in England

8.78 For local housing authorities in England, there is nothing in HA 1996, Pt 7, that cuts down the right to make such repeat applications. Indeed, HA 1996, Pt 7, specifically states that even a person whose previous application resulted in a local housing authority owing him or her the main housing duty can make a fresh application when that duty ends.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 See English Code paras 18.11–18.13
3 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

8.79 In these circumstances it has been left to the courts to work out sensible limits to protect local housing authorities from having to investigate fully what are essentially repetitive applications. The broad rule established by the courts is that a local housing authority is entitled to preface any inquiries into a repeat application by simply considering whether the relevant factual circumstances have changed since the previous application was disposed of.

8.80 If there has been no factual change, the local housing authority is entitled to refuse to entertain the application and to rely on its previous decision (including any previous decision that the local housing authority’s duty to the applicant had been discharged)\(^1\). If, however, there has been such a factual change of circumstances, the local housing authority can no longer rely on its previous decision and must make inquiries into the application in the usual way\(^2\). In R v Harrow London Borough Council ex p Fahia\(^3\), the House of Lords held that there were no administrative short cuts available which would enable a local housing authority to avoid the duty to make at least that level of inquiries into a repeat application\(^4\).

\(^1\) See Johnston v Westminster City Council [2015] EWCA Civ 554, [2015] HLR 35, CA, where the local housing authority agreed that the applicant could make a fresh application for homelessness assistance.

\(^3\) [1998] 1 WLR 1396, (1998) 30 HLR 1124, HL.

\(^4\) See also R (SD) v Oxford City Council [2015] EWHC 1871 (Admin), (2015) October Legal Action, Admin Ct, where Ouseley J held that ‘in order to decide whether it is an application, the sort of investigations envisaged by the later stages of the Act have to be gone through’ at [20], see 8.42–8.44.

8.81 The Court of Appeal applied this approach in Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council\(^5\). Unless a repeat application discloses no new facts on the application form, or any new facts that are disclosed are merely fanciful or trivial, the local housing authority must accept the application, make its inquiries, comply with any other statutory duties that might arise (such as securing accommodation) and notify its decision in accordance with HA 1996, Pt 7. The English Code reflects this approach\(^2\).

\(^2\) English Code, para 18.11.

8.82 Prior to the decision in Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council\(^6\), most local housing authorities were only prepared to accept repeat applications if there had been a ‘material change of circumstances’. There was also a practice of asking repeat applicants if they had obtained and occupied settled accommodation since their earlier applications. The former approach was overruled by Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council\(^2\), and the latter practice is no longer appropriate. Unless a repeat application is based on precisely the same facts as an earlier application when that application was finally disposed of, then it should be accepted. Situations in which two applications for homelessness assistance are ‘exactly the same’ as likely to be rare. Intervening settled accommodation might be a factor distinguishing the second application from the first, requiring a local housing authority to accept and determine a fresh application. Equally, it is not the only factor.

4 The English Code gives an example of a factual change of circumstances a further application following a relationship breakdown (English Code, para 18.13). Obviously, this does not exclude other factual changes in circumstances.

8.83 The various duties under HA 1996, Pt 7 can come to an end when the applicant refuses an offer of suitable accommodation that meets certain statutory requirements. Can the applicant make a further application for homelessness assistance in those circumstances? The starting point will be for the local housing authority to consider whether the application is based on precisely the same facts as the previous application at the time when that previous application was disposed of. The English Code advises:

'[i]n the majority of re-application cases where the applicant has previously refused an offer of suitable accommodation, the housing authority will be entitled to rely on the ending of its duties following the refusal of accommodation. However, if after the refusal of accommodation, the applicant’s factual circumstances change, the housing authority can no longer rely on the completion of the earlier duty and must consider the fresh application.'

2 The HA 1996, s 195(2) (as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) prevention duty comes to an end when the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant has refused an offer of suitable accommodation that would be available for at least six months: HA 1996, s 195B(1)(d) (as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018), see 15.118–15.122. The HA 1996, s 189B(2) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) relief duty comes to an end when the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant has refused an offer of suitable accommodation that would be available for at least six months: HA 1996, s 189B(7)(c) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) see 15.169–15.173, or he or she has refused a final accommodation offer or a final Pt 6 offer: HA 1996, s 189B(7)(a) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) see 15.181–15.188. The HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty comes to an end when the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant has refused a suitable offer of accommodation made under HA 1996, s 193(2), or a suitable offer of HA 1996, Part 6 accommodation or a private rented sector offer: HA 1996, s 193(5), (7) and (7AA), see 16.114–16.123, 16.142–16.152 and 16.163–16.179.

Local housing authorities in Wales

8.84 For local housing authorities in Wales, H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, has put the test on a statutory footing. Under H(W)A 2014, s 62(1) and (2), the duty to carry out an assessment of a person’s case does not arise if the person has been assessed by a local housing authority on a previous occasion and the local housing authority is satisfied (i) that the person’s circumstances have not changed materially since that assessment was carried out; and (ii) there is no new information that materially affects that assessment. If the answer is that the applicant’s circumstances have not changed materially and there is no new information, the local housing authority can refuse to accept the new application for homelessness assistance 1. There is no provision at H(W)A 2014, s 62(2), for the local housing authority to notify the prospective applicant that it has decided that these conditions are satisfied, and that it will not carry out an assessment of his or her case. It follows that there is no right for the prospective applicant to request a review of the decision not to carry out an assessment 2, and so any challenge to that decision would have to be brought by judicial review 3.
Applications 8.86

1 See Welsh Code, paras 10.11–10.12.
2 See H(W)A 2014, s 85, for the right to request a review and 19.70–19.85.
3 See 19.306–19.333 for judicial review.

Factual changes

8.85 As explained 1, the effect of the decisions in R v London Borough of Harrow ex p Fahia 2 and Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council 3 is that a local housing authority in England must ask, on a repeat application for homelessness assistance, whether there has been any change in relevant facts since the previous application was disposed of. A local housing authority in Wales must ask whether the applicant for homelessness assistance was assessed by a local housing authority on a previous occasion, whether the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant’s circumstances have not changed materially since that assessment was carried out and whether there is any new information that materially affects that assessment 4.

1 See 8.80–8.82.
4 H(W)A 2014, s 62(1) and (2); Welsh Code, paras 10.11–10.12.

8.86 In R v London Borough of Harrow ex p Fahia 1, the applicant had occupied guest house accommodation originally provided by the local housing authority while it was making inquiries into her first application. After the local housing authority had decided that she had become homeless intentionally, she had been permitted by the guest house manager to stay on. She claimed housing benefit in order to pay the rent. Over a year later, she was asked to leave the guest house and applied again to the local housing authority. The local housing authority’s refusal to accept her application was quashed as there had been a relevant change in her factual circumstances. The local housing authority had failed to address itself to whether the loss of the non-settled accommodation was a new or supervening event causing a new incidence of homelessness.

8.87 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

8.87 In Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council, the presence of two additional adults in the applicant’s accommodation, rendering it overcrowded, was a relevant change of factual circumstances sufficient for the local housing authority to have to accept a further application¹.

² See 10.122–10.123.

8.88 The Court of Appeal’s decision in Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council on repeat applications was applied in R (May) v Birmingham City Council. In that case, the local housing authority had accepted that it owed a HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty to the applicant. It made the applicant an offer of accommodation which she refused. She was at the time living with her grandmother. The local housing authority notified the applicant that it had decided that its main housing duty had come to an end as a result of her refusal of the offer. The applicant continued to live with her grandmother. Ten months later, the grandmother required the applicant and her children to leave and the applicant tried to make a fresh application for homelessness assistance. The local housing authority refused to accept the application stating that it was not satisfied that there had been a relevant change of circumstances. The judge held that the local housing authority’s decision was irrational and that the circumstances of the applicant were not exactly the same as when she had made her first application for homelessness assistance. Accordingly, the local housing authority was obliged to accept a further application for homelessness assistance³.

² [2012] EWHC 1399 (Admin) (2012) July Legal Action, p 41, Admin Ct. See also R (Daie) v Camden London Borough Council [2006] EWHC 452 (Admin), (2006) May Legal Action, p 34, Admin Ct, where permission was given for an applicant to bring judicial review proceedings where the local housing authority had refused to accept a second application saying that there had been no ‘material change of circumstances’. By the time that the judicial review claim came to a full hearing, the local housing authority had not only accepted the second application but had also concluded that the applicant was owed the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty.
³ It should be noted that the local housing authority had notified the applicant that she was entitled to a review of its decision that there had been no relevant change of circumstances and the applicant had requested a review. This was plainly the wrong procedure since a decision that an application will not be accepted is not one of the decisions of which the applicant has a right to request a review at HA 1996, s 202(1) (see 19.12–19.69 (England) and 19.70–19.85 (Wales)). This was recognised by the applicant’s legal representatives, who brought proceedings in judicial review in order to challenge the decision.

8.89 Case-law decided under the old test of material change of circumstances had held that events that might have been sufficient to require a local housing authority to entertain a second application included:

- the breakdown of the applicant’s marriage¹;
- the award of Disability Living Allowance for night-time supervision (so that an applicant who originally needed one bedroom now needed two-bedroom accommodation)²;
- a threat of possession proceedings combined with overcrowded accommodation³; and

Applications 8.91

- where a medical report showed that an applicant’s health was poor and deteriorating and contained additional material relevant to the original decision that the applicant had become homeless intentionally (a case said to be unusual on its facts)\(^4\). Any of these circumstances would now be instances of changes in relevant facts.

8.90 Changes of circumstances which, on their facts, the courts found, under the old test, were not sufficient to give rise to a duty to entertain a second application included:

- the illness and death of a friend who had been providing unsettled accommodation\(^1\);
- pregnancy of the applicant\(^2\);
- the failure of an arrangement made by a prisoner for his sister to pay the rent during his sentence\(^3\); and
- disrepair to the applicant’s home\(^4\).

Many of these would now constitute changed factual circumstances requiring the local housing authority to entertain a new application under the modern approach.

8.91 Cases where the courts have held that, on their facts, there are new factual circumstances are:

- where the applicant had refused an offer of accommodation, then spent a period in overcrowded accommodation before making a fresh application when the overcrowding worsened\(^1\);
- where the applicant had refused an offer of accommodation, and then spent ten months living with her grandmother before the relationship broke down and her grandmother asked her to leave\(^2\);
- where an applicant who had been found not to be vulnerable or at risk of suicide presented fresh evidence of suicidal ideation\(^3\);
- where the applicant’s husband and three of the couple’s nine children had moved out\(^4\); and
- where the applicant had been evicted from the property from which she had previously refused an offer of accommodation\(^1\).

Abandoned and withdrawn applications

8.92 Having made an application, an individual may decide not to proceed with it or otherwise be unable to proceed with it. Although this must be commonplace, there is no statutory process for local housing authorities in England to deal with the deemed abandonment or withdrawal of applications. In the absence of such provision, local housing authorities will want to make sensible practical arrangements. For local housing authorities in Wales, H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, provides that any duties owed to the applicant will come to an end if the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant has withdrawn his or her application and the applicant has been notified by the local housing authority to that effect.\(^1\)

8.93 If the applicant dies before a decision is reached on the application, the local housing authority can simply substitute (with that person’s consent) another member of the late applicant’s household as applicant.\(^1\)

8.94 Each local housing authority will have its own procedures and policies for allowing applicants to withdraw their own applications.\(^1\)

8.95 More controversial is the question of whether there are circumstances in which the local housing authority may itself treat an application as withdrawn. The English Code recommends that local housing authorities may wish to consider an application as ‘closed’ where there has been no contact from the applicant for three months or longer and that any further approach after that time may be treated as a fresh application; the Welsh Code gives a period of six weeks. If the applicant renews contact during the suggested period, the suggestion is that the local housing authority should resume its original inquiries, and consider all relevant matters, including whether there are any relevant new facts that affect those inquiries.\(^1\)

8.96 That guidance is somewhat at variance with HA 1996, Pt 7, which recognises that contact will be lost with at least some applicants, because it makes special provision for notice of decisions on applications to be retained for later collection at the local housing authority’s offices. This would suggest that the proper course is for every application to result in a decision even if the decision is that, on the material available to the local housing authority, it is not satisfied that the applicant is homeless or threatened with homelessness. This has the additional advantage of enabling a local housing authority to maintain comprehensive statistics for decisions on all applications (and the time it takes to reach them).

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England or after 3 April 2018.

2 HA 1996, ss 184(6) and 203(8).

Simultaneous applications to the same local housing authority

8.97 What happens when an applicant has made an application for homelessness assistance and the decision-making process (or any legal challenges to decisions made on the application) have not been concluded before another application is made to the same local housing authority? That was the case in R (Konodyba) v Kensington & Chelsea Royal London Borough Council where the applicant had been notified of a decision that she was not eligible for assistance, had requested a review which upheld the original decision, had appealed unsuccessfully against the review decision to the county court and had applied for permission to appeal to the Court of Appeal. In the meantime, she had indicated to the local housing authority that she wished to make a fresh application for homelessness assistance because the legal position regarding eligibility had changed. The local housing authority responded that, while the applicant had an outstanding application for homelessness assistance, because the legal position regarding eligibility had changed. The local housing authority responded that, while the applicant had an outstanding application for homelessness assistance, which was currently the subject of an application to the Court of Appeal for permission to appeal, she could not make a fresh application and that a local housing authority cannot entertain two applications for homelessness assistance at the same time.

8.98 The applicant then brought a judicial review claim challenging the local housing authority’s refusal to secure interim accommodation1 for her pending notification of a decision on her asserted new application. At an early stage in the case, a deputy High Court judge considered whether the claimant had a strong prima facie claim and found, for a number of reasons, that she did not. There was a discussion as to whether or not an application for homelessness assistance could be made when the previous application was still subject to legal proceedings. The judge said:

‘[i]f there is arguably a significant change in the circumstances there would be merit in the authority taking a fresh decision on that basis, particularly if the previous application is out of their hands because it is under appeal. If the fresh application is successful, it might render the appeal otiose and thus avoid the time and expense of the appeal being determined. If it is unsuccessful, why should the applicant be prejudiced by having to withdraw his appeal which might otherwise have succeeded. On the other hand, how is an authority to decide if a new application is or is not on exactly the same facts as the previous one . . . If the further application is accepted on the grounds that it is not on exactly the same facts as the previous one, would the authority have to carry out the same statutory inquiries as in the former application, even on matters where it is not said that there had been any change . . . On this approach, and where the first application is under appeal,
8.98 Advisory Services for Homelessness Assistance

it could lead to the appeal being pursued on a factual basis which is inconsistent with the facts of any subsequent application."

8.99 The judge found that it was arguable that the refusal to accept a second application for homelessness assistance in these circumstances was based on a 1 It should be noted that the facts of this case are unusual. The applicant’s principal argument – that she was eligible for assistance (see Chapter 11) – had been rejected by Kensington &

Chelsea Royal London Borough Council, an appeal against that review decision was dismissed by a county court judge, she was granted permission to appeal the decision of the county court judge and in the Court of Appeal abandoned the main point on which she relied. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal, treating it as abandoned. On her second application to Kensington & Chelsea Royal London Borough Council, she sought to raise the same point on eligibility that she had abandoned before the Court of Appeal. The local housing authority found that she was not eligible; a county court judge dismissed her appeal against that decision and the Court of Appeal decided that she could not rely on a legal point that she had previously had the opportunity to raise and had abandoned (Konodyba v Royal Borough of Re-applying to a local housing authority in England within two years of acceptance of a private rented sector offer

8.100 Applicants:

• who made an application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England on or after 9 November 2012;
• who accepted a private rented sector offer which brought the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty triggered by that application to an end;
• the private rented sector tenancy has subsequently come to an end;
• have a right to make a further application for homelessness assistance.

2 HA 1996, s 193(9); English Code, paras 18.16–18.26.

8.101 If the application is made within two years of the date of the applicant’s acceptance of the private rented sector offer, the applicant will be entitled to the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty if the applicant is eligible for assistance, homeless, and did not become homeless intentionally. In other words, the applicant need not still have a priority need in order to be entitled to the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty again.

1 HA 1996, s 195A(1) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

8.102 This special provision will not apply where an applicant would only be entitled to the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty again because of the presence in the applicant’s household of a restricted person. Where the applicant is homeless because of the presence in his or her household of a restricted person, he or she has to have a priority need in order to be entitled to the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty.

8.103 The special provision only applies once. Where an applicant has been the beneficiary of this special provision and has subsequently accepted another private rented sector offer, which then comes to an end within two years of the date of acceptance, the applicant must make a fresh application for homelessness assistance and would have to have a priority need in order to be entitled to the main housing duty again.\(^1\)

8.104 The special provision will not apply to applicants whose applications for homelessness assistance are made more than two years after the date of acceptance of a private rented sector offer. Applicants in that position who may be homeless would have to have a priority need to be entitled to the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty. It should be noted that the date from which the 2-year period begins is the date of acceptance of the private rented sector offer, not the date when the tenancy was granted or when the applicant actually moved in.\(^1\)

8.105 An applicant who had accepted a private rented sector offer and is subsequently served with a Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice by his or her landlord should make his or her application for homelessness assistance as soon as he or she is served with the notice. Provided that the notice is valid, he or she will be found to be homeless on the date on which the notice expires and the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty will apply.\(^1\)

8.106 If the local housing authority has reason to believe that the applicant may be homeless, and may be eligible for assistance, it is under a duty to secure interim accommodation.\(^1\) There is no need to consider whether or not the applicant may have a priority need. That interim accommodation duty will come to an end when one of the following events occurs, whichever is the later event:

- the local housing authority notifies the applicant of a decision that the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty is not owed (because either the applicant is not eligible for assistance or is not homeless);\(^1\)
- the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty has come to an end; or
- the local housing authority notifies the applicant of what other duty, if any, will be owed to him or her following the coming to an end of the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief.\(^1\)

8.107 Prior to 3 April 2018, HA 1996 s 195A also provided that an applicant who had re-applied within two years of having accepted a private rented sector offer, and had been served with a valid Housing Act 1988, s 21, notice, would be threatened with homelessness, and that the duty at HA 1996, s 195(2), to take reasonable steps to help the applicant secure that accommodation did not cease to become available would apply whether or not the applicant had a priority need. Since HA 1996, Pt 7, as amended by HRA 2017, now provides that the HA 1996, s 195(2), prevention duty applies to all applicants who are eligible and are threatened with homelessness, there is no special provision for applicants who are threatened with homelessness and would have fallen under HA 1996, s 195A.

7 See 8.100–8.107.

Challenges to refusals to accept applications

8.108 If a local housing authority refuses to accept an application for homelessness assistance (and therefore declines to undertake inquiries into it) there is no right to any statutory review of that decision, or appeal against it. The applicant could lodge a complaint through the local housing authority’s complaints procedure, but if a swifter remedy is needed, the applicant should apply for a judicial review and ask for a mandatory order requiring the local housing authority to accept the application and comply with its consequent statutory duties. Judicial review is also the proper course if the applicant is dissatisfied with a local housing authority’s decision that it need not accept an application because it is a repeat application and there is no relevant change of facts).

1 Because a refusal to accept an application is not in the list of decisions which carry a right to request a review at HA 1996, s 202(1) as amended by HRA 2017, s 9 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018 (see 19.12–19.69) or at H(W)A 2014, s 85(1) (see 19.70–19.85).

4 See 8.50–8.82 and 8.85–8.91.

8.109 If the judicial review claim results in the local housing authority being required to entertain and inquire into the application, then a decision must be reached on it by the local housing authority and notified with reasons. The applicant will then be entitled to seek a review of that decision (and, if necessary, appeal) in the usual way.

1 See 19.12–19.69 (England) and 19.70–19.85 (Wales).

8.110 Complaint can also be made to the appropriate Ombudsman that the local housing authority is guilty of maladministration by refusing to accept an application for homelessness assistance. In both England and Wales, Ombudsmen have been so concerned at the number of complaints against local housing authorities in this respect that special reports have been published.

INQUIRIES INTO APPLICATIONS

Overview

Local housing authorities in England

9.1 Once a local housing authority in England has reason to believe that a person who has made an application for accommodation (or for assistance in obtaining accommodation) may be homeless or threatened with homelessness, it must make inquiries sufficient to enable it to answer three questions:

(1) whether the applicant is ‘eligible’ for assistance;
(2) if so, whether any duty under the Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996) Pt 7\(^1\) is owed to the applicant; and
(3) if so, what duty is owed\(^2\).

\(^1\) As amended by Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

\(^2\) HA 1996, s 184(1).
9.2 Inquiries and Decisions

9.2 Following the coming into force of the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017) on 3 April 2018, local housing authorities will owe duties to all eligible applicants who are either threatened with homelessness or homeless. Those duties are:

- to make an assessment of the applicant’s case and try to agree a personalised housing plan; and
- if the applicant is threatened with homelessness, to take reasonable steps to help the applicant to secure that accommodation does not cease to become available for his or her occupation (the HA 1996, s 195(2) prevention duty); or
- if the applicant is homeless, to take reasonable steps to help the applicant secure that suitable accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation (the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty).

1 In force for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018: Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (Commencement and Transitional and Savings Provisions) Regulations 2018, SI 2018/167, reg 3; see APPENDIX 2.

2 HA 1996, s 185, see CHAPTER 11.

3 HA 1996, s 175(4) and (5), as amended and inserted by HRA 2017, s 1(2) and (3), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 10.144–10.147 for ‘threatened with homelessness’.

5 HA 1996, s 189A, as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.62–15.86.

6 HA 1996, s 195(2), as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.87–15.137.

9.3 The assessment of the applicant’s case must include an assessment of:

- the circumstances that have caused the applicant to become homeless or threatened with homelessness;
- the applicant’s housing needs, including in particular what accommodation would be suitable for the applicant and for any other relevant persons defined as any persons with whom he or she resides or might reasonably be expected to reside; and
- what support it would be necessary for the applicant and any other relevant persons to have in order to have and retain suitable accommodation.

1 For ‘suitable accommodation’ see CHAPTER 18.

9.4 In practice, the assessment of the applicant’s case will inform the local housing authority as to what reasonable steps it should be taking in the performance of either the HA 1996, s 195(2)1, prevention or HA 1996, s 189B(2)2, relief duty. It may also contain enough information for the local housing authority to be able to decide what further duty, if any, will be owed if accommodation has not been secured for the applicant at the conclusion of

5 Government guidance advises that, in the case of applications for homelessness assistance by young people aged 16 or 17, the principal responsibility for assessment falls upon children’s services (Children Act 1989, ss 17 and 20). However, guidance as to the contents of an assessment where the young person is assessed as part of an application for homelessness assistance is at Chapter 4 of Prevention of Homelessness and Provision of Accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless and/or require accommodation (MHCLG and Department for Education, April 2018) at CD-rom of this book.

9.5 In addition, if the local housing authority has ‘reason to believe’ that an applicant ‘may be’ homeless, eligible for assistance and have a priority need, it has a duty to secure interim accommodation for the applicant and members of the applicant’s household1. That interim accommodation duty will come to an end when one of the following events occurs, whichever is the later event:

• the local housing authority notifies the applicant of a decision that the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty is not owed (because either the applicant is not eligible for assistance or is not homeless)2;
• the local housing authority notifying the applicant of a decision that, when the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty comes to an end, it will not owe the applicant any duty under HA 1996, ss 190 or 193, because it is not satisfied that the applicant has a priority need3;
• the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty has come to an end4; or
• the local housing authority notifies the applicant of what other duty, if any, will be owed to him or her following the coming to an end of the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty5.

9.5 Inquiries and Decisions

9 HA 1996, s 188 (1ZB)(b), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(4), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 16.60–16.65.

10 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 15.138–15.195.

9.6 It follows that a local housing authority should first make inquiries into whether an applicant is eligible and whether he or she is homeless or threatened with homelessness. The inquiries into whether an applicant has a priority need and whether he or she has become homeless intentionally can be carried out whilst the HA 1996, s 195\(^1\) prevention duty or the HA 1996, s 189B\(^2\) relief duty is being performed\(^3\).

1 As amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.87–15.139.

2 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138–15.195.

9.7 Separately, a local housing authority in England has a power, but not a duty, to make inquiries into whether the applicant has a local connection with its district and, if not, whether he or she has a local connection elsewhere\(^4\). This is an entirely discretionary line of inquiry for the local housing authority; it can choose whether or not to make inquiries into local connection, but if it chooses not to do so, the applicant has no right to a review of that decision\(^5\). There are two occasions when the local housing authority might consider making inquiries into the issue of local connection:

- when making inquiries into whether the applicant is eligible for assistance and is homeless, and would therefore be owed the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty; and
- when making inquiries as to what duty, if any, an applicant would be owed when the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty\(^6\) has been performed and the applicant remains without accommodation, and therefore if he or she is eligible for assistance, has a priority need and has not become homeless intentionally, the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty would be owed\(^7\).

5 See 16.94–16.199.

9.8 If the conditions for referral at HA 1996, s 198(2)\(^\dagger\), (2ZA)\(^\dagger\) or (4)\(^\dagger\) are made out, then the local housing authority may refer the applicant’s case to another local housing authority for either the HA 1996, s 189B(2)\(^\dagger\), relief duty or the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty to be performed\(^8\).

Conditions for referral as a result of acceptance of private rented sector offer within two years prior to the date of the application for homelessness assistance, see 14.123–14.137.

Conditions for referral as a result of having been placed by another local housing authority within a prescribed period, see 14.138–14.150.

As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138–15.195.

HA 1996, s 198(1) permits a local housing authority to refer performance of the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty to another local housing authority, see 16.16.

9.9 The trigger for the making of inquiries into the applicant’s eligibility and whether any duty is owed to him or her is extremely low. Any information that causes the local housing authority to have reason to believe that the applicant may be homeless or may be threatened with homelessness is sufficient. An applicant does not need to be applying explicitly for homelessness assistance.

9.10 The scope of the compulsory inquiries may appear to be quite limited. For example, inquiries only need be made to determine ‘whether’ a duty is owed and, therefore, inquiries need not necessarily be made as to the way in which it is appropriate to perform the duty. However, the new HA 1996, s 189A duties to make an assessment of the applicant’s case and record a personalised housing plan mean that the local housing authority will be able to gather enough information to enable it to ask, and answer, the statutory questions and also determine how to perform what duty, if any, is owed to the applicant. This is reflected in the new Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities, (the English Code). There is very little guidance on the making of ‘inquiries’, whereas a chapter is devoted to how to obtain information to be contained in assessments and personalised housing plans.

9.11 The legal obligation is to inquire into the possible application of every relevant duty under HA 1996, Pt 7 regarding the applicant’s circumstances. That would include, for example, whether the duty to protect the applicant’s possessions had been triggered. This minimum requirement should not

Local housing authorities in Wales

9.12 As with local housing authorities in England, once a person has applied to a local housing authority in Wales for accommodation, or for help in retaining or obtaining accommodation, and it appears to the local housing authority that he or she may be homeless\(^1\) or threatened with homelessness\(^2\), the local housing authority must assess whether or not the applicant is eligible for help\(^3\). The only circumstance in which the local housing authority can refuse to carry out an assessment of the person’s case is if it is satisfied that the person’s circumstances have not changed materially since that assessment was carried out, and there is no new information that materially affects that assessment\(^4\).

1 As defined at Housing (Wales)Act 2014 (H(W)A 2014), ss 55–57, see CHAPTER 10.

2 As defined at H(W)A 2014, s 55(4), see 10.144–10.147.

3 H(W)A 2014, s 62(1).

9.13 While it is assessing that initial issue\(^1\), or once it has assessed that the applicant is eligible for help, the local housing authority should also assess:

1. the circumstances that caused the applicant to be homeless or threatened with homelessness\(^2\);
2. the applicant’s housing needs and those of the applicant’s household\(^3\);
3. the support needed for the applicant and his or her household to be able to retain accommodation which is currently available, or which may become available\(^4\); and
4. whether or not the local housing authority has any duty to the applicant under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2\(^5\).

1 Code of Guidance for Local Authorities on the Allocation of Accommodation and Homelessness (Welsh Government, March 2016), (the Welsh Code), see the CD Rom with this book. Paragraphs 10.15–10.16 make the point that ‘provisions of eligibility are complex and may take some time to assess’ and so the assessment of the other matters should take place whilst the local housing authority is assessing eligibility.

4 H(W)A 2014, s 62(5)(c); Welsh Code, paras 10.25–10.29.

9.14 In order to be able to complete its assessment, the local housing authority in Wales must seek to identify the outcome that the applicant wishes to achieve. It should also assess whether exercising any of the local housing authority’s functions under Housing (Wales) Act 2014, Pt 2 (H(W)A 2014) could contribute to the achievement of that outcome\(^1\). The Act is clear that there is no expectation that the Authority must meet the wishes of the applicant unless it is able to do so within the functions detailed in the chapter and within the constraints of the local housing market and their own resources’ (para 10.36).

Structure of this chapter and terminology

9.15 The terminology used by HA 1996, Pt 7\(^1\), and by H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, is somewhat confusing. Local housing authorities in England are required to make ‘inquiries’ into the various matters required at HA 1996, s 184(1). If those inquiries result in a decision that an applicant is eligible and is either threatened with homelessness, or homeless, then the local housing authority has a duty at HA 1996, s 189A(1), to make ‘an assessment of the applicant’s case’\(^2\). The ‘assessment’ of the applicant’s case, and associated personalised housing plan, will assist the local housing authority in its decision as to how to perform any duty owed to the applicant.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 HA 1996, s 189A(1), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.62–15.86.

9.16 However, H(W)A 2014, s 62, requires a local housing authority in Wales to ‘carry out an assessment of a person’s case’ in order to decide whether an applicant is eligible for help and, if so, whether the local housing authority has any duty to the applicant\(^1\). H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, uses the word ‘assessment’ in this context to mean the same process as making ‘inquiries’ under HA 1996, s 184. If the applicant is assessed as being eligible for help, the local housing authority must also assess:

• the circumstances that have caused the applicant to be homeless or threatened with homelessness;
• the housing needs of the applicant and any person with whom the applicant lives or might reasonably be expected to live;
• the support needed for the applicant and any person with whom the applicant lives or might reasonably be expected to live to retain accommodation which is or may become available; and
• whether or not the authority has any duty to the applicant\(^2\).

1 H(W)A 2014, s 62(1), (3) and (4), see 9.12–9.14.

9.17 H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, uses the word ‘assessment’ to mean both the process of making inquiries (into whether the applicant is eligible for help and, if so, whether the local housing authority has a duty to the applicant) and the process of drawing up an assessment of the applicant’s case in order to assist the local housing authority in its decision as to how to perform any duty owed to the applicant.

authorities in England, we are referring to the assessment of the applicant’s case required to be made under HA 1996, s 189A. Where we use the word ‘assessment’ in the context of applications for homelessness assistance made under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, to local housing authorities in Wales, we are referring either to the process of ‘assessment’ in the sense of either making inquiries to establish what duty, if any, is owed to the applicant or to the process of gathering information to assist the local housing authority in deciding how to perform any duty owed.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.62–15.86.

9.19 Considerable guidance as to how these inquiries or assessments should be carried out is provided in each of the Codes.1

1 English Code, chapter 11; Welsh Code, chapter 10.

The sequence of inquiries

9.20 The process of making inquiries may be undertaken in stages, reflecting the sequence of duties in the statutory schemes. For example, the first statutory inquiry is as to whether the applicant is ‘eligible’2. If the local housing authority decides that an applicant is not eligible for assistance, it is not required to make any further inquiries. It would be a waste of time and effort if the local housing authority had to embark on detailed inquiries into other matters, because no duty is owed to an applicant who is ineligible for assistance, beyond the duty to notify the applicant of the reasons for that decision.3 Treating eligibility as a discrete first issue may therefore lead to a saving of time and resources. However, if the applicant may be eligible but the question of eligibility cannot be inquired into and resolved immediately, at least some preliminary further inquiries will be necessary in order for the local housing authority to determine whether the applicant may also be homeless and may have a priority need and thus be the subject of a duty to provide interim accommodation.

1 Prior to the coming into force of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in Wales on or after 27 April 2015, and prior to the amendments to HA 1996, Pt 7, inserted by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, there was some debate about whether the statutory schemes permitted inquiries to be undertaken in stages, or whether all the various questions had to be asked and answered in one decision-making process: see Crawley Borough Council v B (2000) 32 HLR 636, CA and previous editions of this book (Luba, Davies and Johnston, 4th edn, 2016). However, given that both statutory schemes now provide for duties to be owed to eligible applicants who are either homeless or threatened with homelessness, irrespective of whether those applicants also have a priority need and whether they have become homeless intentionally, it must follow that local housing authorities in both England and Wales can first make inquiries into the issues of an applicant’s eligibility and whether he or she is homeless or threatened with homelessness, and can postpone the other issues until the question arises of what other duty, if any, may be owed to the applicant. See Chapters 15 and 16 for the duties that may be owed by local housing authorities in England and Chapter 17 for the duties that may be owed by local housing authorities in Wales.

Inquiries into applications 9.24

3 HA 1996, s 184(3) and English Code, para 11.3; H(W)A 2014, s 63(1); and Welsh Code, para 10.14.

9.21 If a local housing authority in England decides, as a result of its inquiries, that an applicant is eligible for assistance, it must then inquire into whether it owes him or her a duty under HA 1996, Pt 7. The immediate duties that it might owe are:

- either the HA 1996, s 195(2), prevention duty (if the applicant is threatened with homelessness) or HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty (if the applicant is homeless); and

- the duty to make an assessment of the applicant’s case and record a personalised housing plan.

1 HA 1996, s 184(1)(b).

2 As amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.87–15.137.

3 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138–15.195.

4 HA 1996, s 189A, as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.62–15.86.

9.22 So the local housing authority must inquire into and decide whether the applicant is homeless or threatened with homelessness. If the applicant is neither homeless nor threatened with homelessness, no further duty will be owed under HA 1996, Pt 7. No further inquiries need be made and the applicant will be notified accordingly that no duty is owed and provided with the reasons for that decision.

1 As amended by HRA 2017: for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 HA 1996, s 184(3); English Code, paras 11.3–11.6.

9.23 If a local housing authority in Wales has assessed that the applicant is eligible for help, it must then make an assessment of the applicant’s circumstances, housing need, and need for support. It should seek to identify the outcome that the applicant wishes to achieve, and whether the exercise of any of the local housing authority’s functions at H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, could contribute to the achievement of that outcome.

The local housing authority must also assess whether or not it has any duty to the applicant under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. In order to assess whether any duty is owed, the local housing authority must first decide whether the applicant is homeless or threatened with homelessness. If the applicant is not homeless or threatened with homelessness, no duty will be owed beyond that of notifying the applicant of the local housing authority’s decision, with reasons for that decision.

take reasonable steps to help the applicant to secure that accommodation does not cease to be available for his or her occupation. If the applicant is both eligible for assistance and homeless, the local housing authority will owe the applicant a duty to take reasonable steps to help the applicant to secure that suitable accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation. In both cases, Local housing authorities will also owe a duty to make an assessment of the applicant’s case and, for local housing authorities in England, try to agree a personalised housing plan with the applicant.

9.25 It is only once the HA 1996, s 189B(2), or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1) relief duty has come to an end, and the applicant remains homeless and eligible for assistance, that any other duty might arise. In order to decide what further duty, if any, is owed, local housing authorities must inquire into and determine two further issues in respect of most applicants:

(1) whether the applicant has a priority need; and
(2) whether the applicant became homeless intentionally.

1 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 HA 1996, s 184(1)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 62(5)(d).
3 See Chapter 12.
4 See Chapter 13.

9.26 Where an applicant had made an application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England and had accepted a private rented sector offer, if the applicant subsequently makes a further application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England within two years of the date of acceptance of that offer, he or she need not have a priority need in order to be entitled to the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty. This does not apply where the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty would not be owed were it not for the presence in the applicant’s household of a ‘restricted person’. If the applicant’s household contains a restricted person in those circumstances, he or she must have a priority need in order to be entitled to the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty.

3 HA 1996, s 195A(5) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. For more on this special provision for re-applications, see English Code, paras 18.16–18.26; and 9.94–9.100. For ‘restricted person’ see HA 1996, s 184(7) at 9.54–9.56 and 11.163–11.167.
4 For ‘restricted person’ see 9.54–9.56 and 11.163–11.67. For ‘priority’ need, see Chapter 12.

9.27 It follows that the local housing authority need only make inquiries into whether the applicant’s household contains a restricted person if it has already accepted that the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty is owed to the applicant. If the duty is not owed, there is no need to make inquiries into the presence of a restricted person. It also follows that, if the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty in HA 1996, s 193(2), would be owed whether or not the applicant’s household included a restricted person, there is no obligation to make inquiries into the presence of the restricted person.

1 For the duties owed to such ‘restricted cases’: see HA 1996, s 193(3B) and 16.180–16.183 (England); H(W)A 2014, s 76(5) and 17.177 (Wales).

Inquiries into applications 9.31

9.28 If the local housing authority decides to exercise its discretionary power to inquire into whether an applicant has a local connection, care must be taken in deciding when to make such inquiries.

1 HA 1996, s 184(2), see 9.28–9.30.

9.29 Local housing authorities in England may refer performance of either of two duties if the conditions for referral are satisfied. Those duties are:

- the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty to take reasonable steps to help an applicant secure that suitable accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation;
- the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty to secure that accommodation is available for the applicant’s occupation.

1 HA 1996, s 198 as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(8), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.139–15.146 and 16.13–16.17.

2 HA 1996, s 189B(2) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018), see 15.138–15.155. The power to refer is at HA 1996, 198(A1), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(8), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.139–15.146 and 16.13–16.15.

3 HA 1996, s 193(2), see 16.94–16.199. The power to refer is at HA 1996, s 198(1), see 16.16.

9.30 Local housing authorities in Wales may refer performance of the H(W)A 2014, s 73(1) relief duty, but only in respect of applicants who have a priority need and have not become homeless intentionally.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 80(1), see 14.32.

Burden of proof

9.31 The burden of making inquiries rests on the local housing authority. It is for the local housing authority to make the inquiries necessary to ‘satisfy’ itself whether the applicant is ‘eligible’ and then, if satisfied that she or he is eligible, to make the inquiries necessary to satisfy itself whether any duty is owed under
9.31 Inquiries and Decisions

As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see Chapters 15 and 16.

HA 1996, s 184(1); the language used in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, refers to the duty on the local housing authority to 'carry out an assessment of a person’s case', including 'whether or not the authority has any duty to the applicant': H(W)A 2014, s 62(1) and (5)(d).

9.32 It is not for the applicant to ‘prove’ his or her case. This point has been reiterated in decisions of the courts and in successive editions of the Codes. The applicant can obviously be asked, or invited, to cooperate with the inquiries and to provide information, but an application cannot be rejected simply because the applicant has not provided some document or other material considered necessary to prove part of his or her case. It follows that the local housing authority cannot suspend inquiries or transfer its responsibilities onto the applicant by such practices as refusing to make a decision unless the applicant obtains a letter from a person with whom he or she recently resided, or a medical report, or a copy of a police or accident report.

1 R v Woodspring Borough Council ex p Walters (1984) 16 HLR 73, QBD.
2 Welsh Code, para 10.22. The 2018 edition of the English Code contains this advice in relation to the issue of whether or not the applicant became homeless intentionally: English Code, para 9.5.
3 See, for example, Complaints against Southwark London Borough Council, 10 000 207, 10 004 245 and 11 000 193, 22 May 2012, (2012) August Legal Action, p 27. H(W)A 2014, s 79(5) permits the local housing authority to notify the applicant that any duty owed to him or her has come to an end because the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant is unreasonably failing to cooperate with the authority in exercise of any of the functions under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. Guidance in Welsh Code, at paras 15.86–15.89, refers to the test of unreasonably failing to cooperate entirely in relation to the applicant failing to cooperate with the duties to help the applicant, rather than the applicant failing to cooperate with the assessment. See 17.195–17.197.

9.33 The correct approach was summarised in R v Gravesham Borough Council ex p Winchester. The burden lies on local housing authorities to make appropriate inquiries in a caring and sympathetic way. Such inquiries should be pursued rigorously and fairly, but there is no duty to conduct ‘CID type inquiries’. Applicants should be given an opportunity to explain matters which local housing authorities consider may weigh substantially against them.

1 R v Gravesham Borough Council ex p Winchester (1986) 18 HLR 207, QBD.
2 See 9.42–9.49. For an example where a decision was quashed because the decision-maker had not obtained the applicant’s full account, see Mondeh v Southwark London Borough Council (2010) November Legal Action, p 19, Lambeth County Court.

9.34 Very infrequently, an applicant will simply make an application and then refuse to cooperate in the conduct of inquiries, or refuse to provide any but the barest details of himself or herself, or of his or her circumstances. This is not a position that any applicant who was sensibly advised would take, and, if adopted, might suggest that there were issues relating to the applicant’s capacity to conduct his or her affairs.

1 AB v Leicester City Council [2009] EWCA Civ 192, CA. For a similar instance of lack of cooperation in the context of a challenge to a decision of a local authority’s adult care services, see R (WG) v Leicester City Council [2011] EWHC 189 (Admin), [2011] EWCA Civ 483 and [2011] EWCA Civ 861, CA. For the circumstances in which local housing authorities can notify an applicant of a decision that the duty owed has come to an end as a result of the applicant’s deliberate and unreasonable refusal to co-operate, see 15.196–15.221 (England) and 17.195–17.197 (Wales).

9.35 At the end of the inquiries there is unlikely to be any remaining doubt or uncertainty as to whether an applicant is ‘eligible’, or over most of the decisions as to what duties, if any, are owed. The local housing authority will be able to determine whether it is satisfied that the applicant is ‘eligible’, ‘threatened with homelessness’, ‘homeless’, and has a ‘priority need’. However, the burden of proof may be decisive where the issue is whether the applicant has become homeless intentionally. On that matter, the legal question is whether the local housing authority is not satisfied that the applicant became homeless, or threatened with homelessness, intentionally1. Accordingly, on that question, if there is doubt or uncertainty, the issue must be resolved in the applicant’s favour.

1 HA 1996, s 193(1) and English Code, para 9.5; H(W)A 2014, s 75(2)(d) and Welsh Code, para 17.12; and see 13.19–13.28.

Scope of inquiries

9.36 The legal obligation on a local housing authority in England is to make ‘such inquiries as are necessary’1. But who decides which inquiries are ‘necessary’? The courts have repeatedly indicated that it is for the local housing authority to decide what inquiries it considers ‘necessary’ to undertake. A local housing authority will only err in law if it has failed to make an inquiry that no reasonable local housing authority would have regarded as unnecessary2.

1 HA 1996, s 184(1), as explained in R v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council ex p Bayani (1990) 22 HLR 406, CA. The duty on a local housing authority in Wales is to ‘carry out an assessment of a person’s case’: H(W)A 2014, s 62(1).

9.37 The local housing authority must ensure that it has, in the course of its inquiries, taken all of the applicant’s circumstances into account and come to an overall, or composite, view. Whilst inquiries into different aspects, such as medical factors, may be made by different officers of the local housing authority, the final decision should be taken by an officer who has all of the information available1.

1 R v Lewisham London Borough Council ex p Dolan (1993) 25 HLR 68, QBD.

9.38 Although it is for the local housing authority to decide what inquiries are necessary, its decision must still be lawful. A judge sitting in the Administrative Court found that it was ‘highly arguable’ that no lawful inquiries had been conducted, in a case where the applicant had attended council offices to make an application for homelessness assistance, supported by a report from his GP setting out his medical condition and the GP’s opinion that he was vulnerable1. The applicant had been interviewed on the same day that he attended, and, at the end of a ‘relatively short interview’, the interviewing officer printed off, signed and handed him a written decision purporting to be made under HA
9.38 Inquiries and Decisions

1996, s 184(3), notifying him that the local housing authority did not consider him to have a priority need. The judge commented that inquiries into mental health issues and issues arising from historic mistreatment of former asylum seekers would normally require consultation with the applicant’s medical advisers and the relevant mental health services, would usually require a further assessment and report from a psychiatrist, and could be expected to extend to a detailed inquiry into the applicant’s way of life prior to his or her homelessness. It would have been impossible for any of those inquiries to have been undertaken during the initial screening interview.\(^1\)

\(^1\) See 9.70–9.80, 12.76–12.125 (England) and 12.199–12.206 (Wales).

9.39 Local housing authorities are required by HA 1996, s 182, and H(W)A 2014, s 98(1), to take into account the guidance contained in the Codes of Guidance\(^1\). For this purpose, local housing authorities need to be able to refer to the current version of the relevant Codes\(^2\). If the local housing authority decides to disregard the guidance in the Codes or other guidance, the onus lies on the local housing authority to justify that decision\(^3\). However, there is no obligation on a local housing authority to identify each paragraph of the relevant Code which bears upon the decision, provided that, reading the decision as a whole, it is plain that the decision-maker had regard to the guidance\(^4\).

\(^1\) If the Secretary of State additionally issues any Code of Practice, a local housing authority in England must have regard to it: HA 1996, s 214A(12) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 11, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018).

\(^2\) See R v Newham London Borough Council ex p Bones (1993) 25 HLR 357, QBD, where a decision based on an out-of-date edition of the Code was quashed. In Mondeh v Southwark London Borough Council (2010) November Legal Action, p 19, Lambeth County Court, a review decision was quashed, in part, because the reviewing officer had failed to address the Code of Guidance and had failed to give reasons for departing from its guidance. See also Walsh v Haringey London Borough Council (2014) July/August Legal Action, p 56, Clerkenwell and Shoreditch County Court.

9.40 In fixing the scope, form and manner of making its inquiries, a local housing authority must bear in mind its obligations under equalities legislation. The Equality Act 2010, s 149(1) contains the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) which requires local housing authorities in both England and in Wales to:

- have due regard to the need to—
  - eliminate discrimination, harassment, victimisation and any other conduct that is prohibited by or under this Act;
  - advance equality of opportunity between persons who share a relevant protected characteristic\(^1\) and persons who do not share it;

\(^1\)
Inquiries into applications 9.41

(c) foster good relations between persons who share a relevant protected characteristic and persons who do not share it.

1 The relevant protected characteristics for the purposes of Equality Act 2010, s 149(1), are: age, disability, gender re-assignment, pregnancy and/or maternity, race, religion and/or belief, sex, and sexual orientation: Equality Act 2010: s 149(7). An additional protected characteristic in the Equality Act 2010 is marriage and/or civil partnership, Equality Act 2010, s 4, but this is not a ‘relevant’ protected characteristic for the purposes of the public sector equality duty at Equality Act 2010, s 149(1).

9.41 The courts have held that decision-makers must take steps to take account of any disability or any other protected characteristic in the Equality Act 2010 which may be relevant to the decision being considered\
. This is the case even if the disability or other protected characteristic is not obvious to the decision-maker. If there appears to be a protected characteristic, which has some relevance to the decisions being considered, at each stage of the decision-making the local housing authority must have the equality duty well in mind. The local housing authority should consider whether the applicant (or a member of his or her household) has a relevant protected characteristic, the extent of that protected characteristic and the likely effect of the protected characteristic, when taken together with any other functions, on the applicant or the member of his or her household\
. The relevant principles are summarised by a Court of Appeal judge as follows:

‘First, the aim of the PSED (as of other equality duties) is to bring equality issues into the mainstream, so that they become an essential element in public decision making: . . . In Bracking, at [59], McCombe LJ said:

“It seems to have been the intention of Parliament that these considerations of equality of opportunity (where they arise) are now to be placed at the centre of formulation of policy by all public authorities, side by side with all other pressing circumstances of whatever magnitude.”

That was a case about formulation of policy, but the underlying principle applies equally to public authority decision-making of any kind.

Secondly, the duty is a matter of substance rather than of form. It requires that the decision maker be aware of the duty to have due regard to the relevant matters: see per Aikens LJ in Brown at [91]: “It involves a conscious approach and state of mind.”

. . . The duty must be exercised in substance, with rigour and with an open mind. It is not a question of ticking boxes: . . . “The question in every case is whether the decision-maker has in substance had due regard to the relevant statutory needs. Just as the use of a mantra referring to the statutory provision does not of itself show that the duty as being performed, so too a failure to refer expressly to the statute does not of itself show that the duty has not been performed.”

Third, the concept of due regard is to be distinguished from a requirement to give the PSED considerations specific weight. It is not a duty to achieve a particular result . . . In Hurley, Elias LJ said this at [78]:

“The concept of ‘due regard’ requires the court to ensure that there has been a proper and conscientious focus on the statutory criteria, but if that is done, the court
9.41 Inquiries and Decisions cannot interfere with the decision simply because it would have given greater weight to the equality implications of the decision than did the decision maker3.

Interviewing the applicant

9.42 A local housing authority is obviously obliged to give the applicant the opportunity to explain his or her circumstances fully. Whether or not procedural fairness requires that an applicant be interviewed is a decision for the local housing authority. In particular, if the local housing authority accepts the applicant’s facts and circumstances, but takes a different view on the questions that it has to decide, there is no obligation to put that view to the applicant for comment1. However, a view of certain facts that could lead to a decision against the applicant’s interests should normally be put to him or her before the decision is made2. In Royal Borough of Windsor and Maidenhead v Hemans3, Toulson LJ said: ‘[i]t is striking that at no time was [the applicant], either directly or through her solicitors, given the opportunity to meet the suggestion, if the review officer really had it in mind, that this account was essentially fictitious’4. One county court judge has decided that, where an applicant’s credibility is at issue, he or she should be personally interviewed by the officer making the relevant decision, not by another officer5. In some circumstances, an interview would be essential, particularly where the local housing authority is considering disbelieving the applicant’s account6.

and Royal Borough of Windsor and Maidenhead v Hemans [2010] EWCA Civ 374, [2011]
HLR 25, CA. See also Welsh Code, para 10.22.

9.43 Generally, the local housing authority will interview the applicant face to face, although there is no reason why the local housing authority should not put questions to the applicant by letter1.

483, [2007] HLR 40, CA, a local housing authority had not made an error of law when it asked the applicant to confirm what it understood to be her version of events on a tear-off slip, and then relied upon that confirmation.
Inquiries into applications 9.47

9.44 A local housing authority in England was severely criticised by the Local Government Ombudsman for failing to use interpreters in all of its interviews with a particular applicant. In another case, an applicant with impaired hearing was not provided with sufficient assistance during the inquiries.

1 Complaint against Waltham Forest London Borough Council, 03/A/15819, 9 November 2005.

9.45 The local housing authority’s inquiries and, in particular, any interview of the applicant, should be conducted in a ‘caring and sympathetic way’. It is for the local housing authority to decide how it conducts any interview, how long it lasts and what questions are asked. An error of law will only be made out if the style of questioning has the effect of inhibiting the applicant from putting forward his or her case or any facts which might assist the application.

1 R v Gravesham Borough Council ex p Winchester (1986) 18 HLR 207, QBD. See also English Code, para 11.9 ‘Applicants should be encouraged to share information without fear that this will reduce their chances of receiving support, and questions should be asked in a sensitive way and with an awareness that the applicant may be reluctant to disclose personal details if they lack confidence that their circumstances will be understood and considered sympathetically’. See also specific guidance for interviewing victims of domestic violence at English Code para 21.23.

9.46 The local housing authority is not required to accept what the applicant says at face value. If the applicant’s response raises a relevant matter of fact that the local housing authority is not prepared simply to accept, the local housing authority must investigate it. If there is any doubt, and the matter cannot be resolved by further reasonable inquiries, the question should be resolved in the applicant’s favour, at least where it relates to whether or not the applicant had become homeless intentionally.

3 R v Gravesham Borough Council ex p Winchester (1986) 18 HLR 207, QBD; English Code, para 9.5; Welsh Code, para 17.12. See also 9.31–9.35.

9.47 Statements from third parties containing material contrary to the applicant’s case should be put to the applicant for comment before the local housing authority decides whether or not it accepts those statements. Usually this can be achieved by simply showing the applicant the statements. Guidance on the situation which arises where it is important not to disclose the identity of the third party is given in R v Poole Borough Council ex p Cooper. It may be that the applicant is able to provide reasons why the adverse information from the third party cannot be relied upon. Adverse medical evidence, whether from the local housing authority’s own medical adviser or the applicant’s doctor(s), should also be put to the applicant for comment before a decision is reached. If the local housing authority is relying on factual information in relation to the applicant’s case which conflicts with the applicant’s own account, that information should be put to the applicant for comment.\(^1\)
9.47 Inquiries and Decisions

1. (1994) 27 HLR 605, QBD.

2. See R v Ealing London Borough Council ex p Chanter (1992) December Legal Action, p 22, QBD, where the applicant’s sister had informed the local housing authority that the applicant had left accommodation voluntarily but, had the statement been put to the applicant, she would have told the local housing authority of long-standing hostility between herself and her sister.

4. See Lane and Ginda v Islington London Borough Council (2001) April Legal Action, p 21, Clerkenwell County Court, where the local housing authority’s failure to put information as to the frequency of lift breakdown to the applicant before deciding that accommodation offered was ‘suitable’ resulted in the decision being quashed. See also English Code, para 18.33: ‘In cases where contradictory factual accounts are put before the housing authority, and it prefers one account to another, the decisions letter should explain why a particular account was preferred.’

9.48 The local housing authority is entitled to rely upon the applicant’s own statement or statements. However, if there is ambiguity or subsequent contradiction of a statement by the applicant, the local housing authority should give the applicant an opportunity to challenge its interpretation of his or her earlier statement.\(^1\) It is not for the applicant to volunteer matters that may or may not be relevant. It is for the local housing authority, through interview and other inquiries, to identify those relevant matters and then make the necessary inquiries into them.\(^2\) Where an interview would not yield more information than is already known to the local housing authority, an interview will not be a necessary part of the duty to make inquiries.\(^3\)

1. Robinson v Brent London Borough Council (1999) 31 HLR 1015, CA.

2. R v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council ex p Ullah (1992) 24 HLR 680, QBD; the Welsh Code advises that there may be factors that make it difficult for applicants to explain their situation fully: Welsh Code, para 10.21.

9.49 In addition, once the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant is eligible for assistance and is either threatened with homelessness, or is homeless, the local housing authority is under a duty to make an assessment of the applicant’s case and to draw up a personalised housing plan.\(^1\) Both Codes of Guidance are predicated on the assumption that an assessment of needs will require a face-to-face interview.\(^2\)

For local housing authorities in Wales, the duty to assess is owed once an applicant has applied to a local housing authority for accommodation or for help in retaining or obtaining accommodation and it appears to the local housing authority that the person may be homeless or threatened with homelessness, and the local housing authority is satisfied that, if the person has been assessed on a previous occasion, the person’s circumstances have not changed materially and there is no new information that materially affects the previous...

assessment: H(W)A 2014, s 62(1) and (2). Once the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant is eligible for help, it is under a duty to carry out a more detailed assessment: H(W)A 2014, s 62(5), see 9.12–9.14.

Timescale

9.50 There is no time limit prescribed by HA 1996, Pt 7 or by H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, for the completion of inquiries. The Codes work on the premise that the obligation to inquire or to assess is triggered as soon as the applicant gives the local housing authority reason to believe that he or she may be homeless, or may be threatened with homelessness. Previous editions of the English Code encouraged local housing authorities to carry out their inquiries ‘as quickly as possible’ notify the applicant of their decision within 33 working days, counted from the date on which the application was received. There is no advice on specific timescale in the current edition of the English Code because the assessment of the applicant’s case will depend on the applicant’s particular circumstances. The only recommendation arises in the context of the decision as to what duty, if any, might be owed when the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty comes to an end. In those circumstances, the English Code advises that local housing authorities should not delay completing their inquiries. It should be possible to notify the applicant on the 57th day. If significant further investigations are required, the English Code advises that inquiries should be completed and a decision notified within a maximum of 15 working days after the end of the 56-day period.

5 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 15.138–15.195.

6 The day after the 56-day period for the performance of the HA 1996, s 189B(2) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for application for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) relief duty.

7 English Code, para 14.16.

9.51 The Welsh Code advises that the duty to assess arises as soon as the conditions at H(W)A 2014, s 62(1), are satisfied, and that, if there is any doubt, the local housing authority should begin the assessment process. The Welsh Code also recommends that each stage of the assessment should be completed, and the outcome should be notified to the applicant, within 10 working days, although the priority is that the assessment and the decision should be correct.

2 Welsh Code, paras 10.8–10.9.

3 Welsh Code, paras 10.5 and 10.53–10.54.

9.52 It is unlawful for a local housing authority to postpone the taking of a decision once it has reached the conclusion of its inquiries (or to extend the inquiry process artificially) simply in order to avoid a duty. Most commonly, this might arise where a 17-year-old makes an application for homelessness assistance shortly before his or her eighteenth birthday1.

1 Robinson v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council [2006] EWCA Civ 1122, [2007] HLR 7, CA. While 17-year-olds have a priority need by virtue of their age, that is not the position with 18-year-olds: Homelessness (Priority Need for Accommodation) (England) Order 2002, SI 2002/2051, art 3 and H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(d) and see 12.137–12.159 (England) and 12.212–12.213 (Wales). In R (Raw) v Lambeth London Borough Council [2010] EWHC 507 (Admin), (2011) May Legal Action, p 24, Admin Ct, the judge considered that a practice of deferring or ceasing inquiries where an applicant for homelessness assistance had been referred to a rent deposit scheme would also be an illegitimate approach and an impermissible reason for not performing the duty to inquire. See also, in a different context, R (Edwards) v Birmingham City Council [2016] EWHC 173 (Admin), [2016] HLR 11, Admin Ct per Hickinbottom J at [44]. See also 8.15.

9.53 If the local housing authority simply fails to progress or complete its inquiries, or fails to notify the decision made on the conclusion of its inquiries to the applicant, the applicant is left in a limbo situation1. As no decision has been notified, the applicant does not have the right to request a review of it. Instead, an applicant would need to bring judicial review proceedings for a mandatory order requiring the local housing authority to complete its inquiries and notify its decision by a specified date2. Alternatively, the applicant could complain through the local housing authority’s complaints procedure and ultimately to the Local Government and Social Care Ombudsman or Public Services Ombudsman for Wales who can recommend that inquiries be concluded and/or that the applicant should be compensated for delays which amount to maladministration3.

1 If no decision is reached and notified to the applicant, then any accommodation that had been secured for the applicant under the duty at HA 1996, s 188(1), or H(W)A 2014, s 68(2), will continue to be occupied under that duty (see 16.38–16.80 (England) and 17.118–17.134 (Wales)). In O’Callaghan v Southwark London Borough Council (2010) May Legal Action, p 23, Lambeth County Court, the applicant was in that position. She subsequently lost her accommodation. On a further application for homelessness assistance, the local housing authority’s decision that she had become homeless intentionally was wrong in law, as she could not have become homeless intentionally from accommodation secured under HA 1996, s 188(1). See also Complaint against Newham London Borough Council, 13 005 484, 17 March 2014 (2014) June Legal Action, p 40, where the Ombudsman awarded £750 compensation for, among other faults, a failure to notify acceptance of the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty. Complaint against Lambeth London Borough Council, 16 005 834, 15 August 2017 (2017) November Legal Action, p 41, where £3,000 compensation was recommended for a delay of almost a year, and for 20 months’ occupation of unsuitable accommodation.

2 In R v Lambeth London Borough Council ex p Weir [2001] EWHC 121 (Admin), (2001) June Legal Action, p 26, Admin Ct, the local housing authority was required to notify the applicant within 14 days after a 20-month delay; in R v Brent London Borough Council ex p Miyanger (1996) 29 HLR 628, QBD, the local housing authority was required to make a decision within 28 days and notify the applicant within a further three days, after the local housing authority had failed to comply with an agreement made three months earlier that a decision would be made. See 19.306–19.333 for judicial review.

3 The Local Government Ombudsman described a local housing authority’s failure to reach a decision in one case as ‘clearly unacceptable’ and ‘a failure to fulfill its statutory responsibilities’: Complaint against Hounslow London Borough Council, 10 019 388, 5 October 2011, (2011) December Legal Action, p 29. See also Complaint against Hounslow London Borough Council, 11 008 191, 28 August 2012 (2012) November Legal Action, p 14 where maladministration was found for, amongst other failings, a delay of approximately three months in reaching a decision; Complaint against Birmingham City Council, 13 017 548, (2014) October Legal Action, p 30, where £400 was awarded for a delay of five months; Complaint against Hounslow London Borough Council, 13 008 825, (2014) December Legal Action, p 34, where £5,000 compensation was awarded for delay of over 12 months; Complaint against Lambeth London Borough Council, 14 014 884, 8 December 2015, (2016)

The special rules for restricted persons

9.54 Where the applicant’s household includes a ‘restricted person’¹, there may be additional inquiries to be made and additional notification duties².

2 HA 1996, s 184(3A) as amended by HRA 2017, ss 4(3) and 5(3) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, and English Code, paras 7.25–7.28; H(W)A 2014, s 63(2), and Welsh Code, para 10.59. See 9.126–9.130.

9.55 A ‘restricted person’ is defined as a person:

- who is not eligible for assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7¹ or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2²; and
- who is subject to immigration control within the meaning of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996³; and either
  - who does not have leave to enter or remain in the UK; or
  - who has leave to enter or remain in the UK but is subject to a condition to maintain and accommodate himself or herself, and any dependent, without recourse to public funds⁴.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 See CHAPTER 1.
3 See 11.26–11.31 and 11.101.
4 HA 1996, s 184(7); H(W)A 2014, s 63(5).

9.56 It follows that British nationals, some Commonwealth nationals with the right of abode in the UK and most EEA nationals and their family members cannot be restricted persons⁴.

1 See 11.26–11.31. The difference between those who are owed a main housing duty (HA 1996, s 193(2)) or duty to secure accommodation for an applicant in priority need (H(W)A 2014, s 75(2)) because of the presence in his or her household of a restricted person, and other applicants owed the same duty, is that the local housing authority is required to bring the duty in a restricted case to an end by making a private rented sector offer so far as reasonably practicable, whereas it may, but is not required to, make a private rented sector offer to other applicants (HA 1996, s 193(7AA)–(7AD), H(W)A 2014, s 76(5)). See 16.180–16.185 (England) and 17.177 (Wales).

Particular situations

Violence, harassment or abuse

9.57 There is a specific chapter in the English Code contains guidance on providing homelessness services to people who have experienced, or are at risk of, domestic violence or abuse⁴. The Code contains guidance that it is essential that inquiries do not provoke further violence and abuse. Local housing authorities are warned against approaching the alleged perpetrator. Information may be sought from the applicant, his or her friends or relatives, from adult care or children’s services, or from the police.
9.57 Inquiries and Decisions

1 English Code, chapter 21.
2 Welsh Code, para 10.22.

9.58 If the violence or abuse alleged is domestic violence or abuse, local housing authorities are reminded that the applicant ‘may be in considerable distress’. Any interview should be conducted by an officer who is trained to deal with domestic violence allegations, and the applicant should have the option of requesting an officer of the same sex as him or her. Local housing authorities are advised that applicants alleging domestic violence may not be able to produce independent evidence of the violence. Whilst a local housing authority may seek corroboration, it should not reject the applicant’s account merely because there is no evidence of complaints to the police or other agencies. Local housing authorities are reminded that the term ‘violence’ should not be given a restrictive meaning and that the test to be applied is not whether violence or abuse occurred in the past but whether it is probable that there will be violence, threats of violence that are likely to be carried out, or abuse, if the applicant continues to occupy his or her home.

9.59 A local housing authority must investigate accounts of violence, harassment or abuse given by the applicant when it is making its inquiries into whether accommodation is or was reasonable for the applicant to occupy. A local housing authority cannot refuse to investigate these accounts merely because the applicant had failed to raise them at an earlier stage.

1 R v Northampton Borough Council ex p Clarkson (1992) 24 HLR 529, QBD, where the local housing authority’s decision that an applicant had become homeless intentionally was quashed, as it had failed to make inquiries into her account that her brother had sexually harassed her at the accommodation.
2 R v Hackney London Borough Council ex p Decordova (1994) 27 HLR 108, QBD.

9.60 If the local housing authority is considering disbelieving an applicant because of contradictions or inconsistencies in his or her account, or because of information derived from other sources, those contradictions or inconsistencies should be put to the applicant for explanation.

Modern slavery and trafficking

9.61 The English Code contains a specific chapter giving guidance on assisting applicants who may have been subject to modern slavery, or trafficked. In relation to inquiries, it advises that applicants may be in considerable distress, and local housing authority officers should have appropriate training to enable them to conduct interviews. Applicants should be given the option of being interviewed by a person of the same sex as them, if they wish\(^2\).
Inquiries into applications 9.65

1. English Code, chapter 25.
2. English Code, paras 25.15.

Financial problems

9.62 If accommodation has been lost as a result of the applicant accruing rent or mortgage arrears, the local housing authority will need to make inquiries into the applicant’s financial affairs. Those same issues may also be relevant to the question of whether accommodation currently occupied by the applicant is reasonable for him or her to continue to occupy\(^1\).

9.63 The local housing authority should examine why the applicant had fallen into arrears and give him or her an opportunity to explain the cause of the arrears, their extent and any arrangements made to repay them\(^1\). The local housing authority should investigate whether an applicant knew about the availability of housing benefit or other relevant welfare benefits, whether housing benefit was claimed and if not, why not\(^2\). In a case where the applicants had not disputed the landlord’s claim to possession on the grounds that they were in arrears, but had subsequently argued that the contractual rent was lower than that put forward to the court, and therefore they were not in arrears, the local housing authority was not obliged to make inquiries into the actual level of the contractual rent. The court would not have made a possession order if the contractual rent had been the amount stated by the applicants\(^3\).

1. R v Wyre Borough Council ex p Joyce (1983) 11 HLR 73, QBD.

9.64 If an applicant gave up his or her accommodation due to financial pressures, the local housing authority must determine the extent of those pressures, eg what debts may have been owed by the applicant and what the arrangements for repayment were. If loans were taken out to support a business venture, it is relevant to inquire into what the applicant knew or ought to have known about the business’s prospects\(^1\). The local housing authority must consider fully whether or not an applicant could have afforded to have remained in his or her accommodation, but need not engage in detailed arithmetical calculations or verification of itemised expenses\(^2\).

1. R v Exeter City Council ex p Tranckle (1993) 26 HLR 244, QBD.

9.65 The Court of Appeal has said that the right question for a local housing authority to determine was whether the rent was affordable for an applicant, and therefore whether it was reasonable for her to have continued to occupy the property. The issues of whether the applicant may in fact have spent part of her benefits on other things apart from basic expenses, or have failed to pay the whole of her housing benefit to her landlord, were not strictly relevant if the accommodation was never in fact affordable on the applicant’s income. The local housing authority’s decision had been wrong not to give reasons for its decision that certain items of expenditure had been considered by the decision-maker to be non-essential items.

See also Balog v Birmingham City Council [2013] EWCA Civ 1582, [2014] HLR 14, CA, where the issue of affordability had been lawfully assessed by the local housing authority; and Samuels v Birmingham City Council [2015] EWCA Civ 1051, [2015] HLR 47, CA. Loss of assured shorthold tenancy 9.66 The most frequently occurring reason in England for the loss of the last settled home, leading to an application for homelessness assistance, is where a landlord has obtained a mandatory order for possession under Housing Act 1988, s 21, against an assured shorthold tenant. Where an applicant for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England has received a valid Housing Act 1988, s 21, notice, he or she will be threatened with homelessness during the 56-day period leading up to the date of expiry of the notice, and the HA 1996, s 195(2), prevention duty will be owed. The local housing authority should make inquiries to satisfy themselves that the notice is valid.

1 Table 774, Statutory Homelessness Live Tables, MHCLG. In Wales, loss of an assured shorthold tenancy was a significant cause of homelessness, but not the most frequent cause: Table: Households accepted as homeless by main reason for loss of last settled accommodation, Welsh Government, 2015 (the Welsh Government no longer publishes statistics on the causes of homelessness).

2 HA 1996, s 175(3), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 1(3), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; see 10.146.

3 As amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; see 15.87–15.137.

4 The availability of defences to a claim for possession brought after expiry of the date for possession in a Housing Act 1988, s 21, notice is beyond the scope of this work. Readers are referred to Defending Possession Proceedings (Luba, Madge, McConnell, Gallagher, Madge-Wyld, Legal Action Group, 8th edn, 2016).

9.67 After the date for expiry of the notice, the applicant may no longer be threatened with homelessness, but instead have become homeless. The Secretary of State’s position, as recommended in the English Code, is that if the local housing authority is satisfied that the landlord intends to seek possession and that further efforts from the local housing authority to resolve the situation and persuade the landlord to allow the tenant to remain in the property are unlikely to be successful and there would be no defence to an application for a possession order, then it is unlikely to be reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy beyond the expiration date in the notice, (unless the local housing authority is taking steps to persuade the landlord to allow the tenant to continue to occupy the accommodation for a reasonable period to provide an opportunity for alternative accommodation to be found).
In addition, the Secretary of State’s view is that it is highly unlikely to be reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy once a court has made an order for possession and that local housing authorities should not consider it reasonable for an applicant to remain in occupation until the point when a warrant or writ is issued. The local housing authority will need to make inquiries into all of these issues.

1 Which would mean that the HA 1996, s 195(2), as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, prevention duty has come to an end: HA 1996, s 195(8)(c) (as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) and the HA 1996, s 189B(2) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) would apply, see 15.113–15.117.

2 English Code, para 6.36.

9.68 If the local housing authority decides that the applicant is homeless, it is entitled to consider the reasons why the landlord wanted possession of the property and whether those reasons could be said to be as a result of the applicant’s deliberate act or omission (for example, in accruing rent arrears) and whether or not the applicant has become homeless intentionally.

1 Either because the accommodation is not reasonable to continue to occupy while the landlord brings possession proceedings, see 10.110–10.116, or because the landlord has obtained and executed a possession order.

Acquiescence

9.69 In general, if a household has lost accommodation as a result of the deliberate act or omission of one of its members (eg by the one who was the tenant or owner accruing rent or mortgage arrears or engaging in nuisance behaviour), the local housing authority is entitled to assume that the other one acquiesced in that behaviour. However, if there is any suggestion to the contrary, the local housing authority must investigate whether there was in fact such acquiescence in that particular case.

1 R v North Devon District Council ex p Lewis [1981] 1 WLR 328, QBD.

Medical conditions

9.70 A local housing authority may need to make inquiries into an applicant’s medical condition in order to decide whether he or she has a priority need, whether previous accommodation was reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy, or whether accommodation currently occupied or offered for occupation is suitable for the applicant’s needs.

1 See 12.76–12.125 (England) and 12.199–12.206 (Wales).
3 See Chapter 18 of this book.
9.71 Inquiries and Decisions

9.71 Where the local housing authority has to make decisions on both medical and non-medical aspects, it cannot treat the two aspects entirely separately. It must come to an overall, or composite, assessment of the applicant’s circumstances.1

9.72 In 2013, the Universities of York and Heriot Watt published research into medical evidence and decision-making in applications for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in England: “You can judge them on how they look . . . ”, Homelessness Officers, Medical evidence and Decision-Making in England1. The research found that decision-makers were often influenced by their own initial impressions of applicants. Physical infirmity, such as walking with a stick, shortness of breath or amputated limbs, was seen as a strong indicator of vulnerability even before any information had been collected. Investigating officers could be suspicious of an applicant’s behaviour, particularly if he or she appeared to be ‘too clever’ or knew ‘the system’ too well. It was routine to seek the views of the applicant’s GP, and sometimes the views of hospital consultants, but medical professionals who were treating the applicant were perceived to be less objective than the medical advisers to the local housing authority. A significant amount of reliance was placed on the medication, and dosages, prescribed. Often decision-makers would look up the medication on the internet themselves rather than obtain expert advice. The researchers conclude that authoritative letters from an applicant’s medical advisers should specify the length of time that the adviser has known the applicant, the degree of familiarity with his or her condition, the diagnosis, the medication prescribed and an explanation of any particular drug or dosage. They also suggest that the adviser should comment on the effect or likely impact of street homelessness on the diagnosed conditions, and how and why the prognosis might be worsened by street homelessness.

Use of medical advisers

9.73 Where a medical issue is raised by the applicant, or is apparent from the information available, the local housing authority should obtain medical evidence. A local housing authority can obtain the opinion of its own medical adviser, or any medical evidence, but any decisions on the facts and the overall assessment should each be made by the local housing authority itself and not delegated to the medical adviser. If the inquiries indicate that the applicant is anxious or depressed or has some other mental health condition, it may be appropriate to obtain specialist psychiatric evidence.

Inquiries into applications 9.75

had known that a further report would be produced, it was wrong in law for the local housing authority to make its decision without waiting for that report or obtaining further evidence itself: Woldeab v Southwark London Borough Council (2011), November Legal Action, p 39, Lambeth County Court.

3 R v Brent London Borough Council ex p McManus (1993) 25 HLR 643, QBD. But see Wells v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council [2006] EWCA Civ 755, (2006) September Legal Action, p 14, CA, where the local housing authority was entitled to rely on the opinion of its own medical adviser, a GP, who had accepted (but provided a 'gloss' to) the opinion expressed by the applicant’s treating psychiatrist. See also R (IA) v Westminster City Council [2013] EWHC 1273 (QB), (2013) July/August Legal Action, p 23, QBD. In Oyebanji v Waltham Forest London Borough Council, 22 August 2013, Central London County Court, (2014) February Legal Action, p 31, the local housing authority had been wrong in law to prefer the opinion of a psychiatrist who had not seen the applicant over the evidence of a practising psychotherapist who saw her regularly.

9.74 The medical adviser must act fairly in obtaining any relevant information from the applicant’s own doctors and in coming to an opinion. Depending on the circumstances, the applicant’s medical records should be considered and it may even be necessary for the medical adviser to examine the applicant personally or to discuss the case with the applicant’s own doctor.1

1 R v Lambeth London Borough Council ex p Walters (1994) 26 HLR 170, QBD; and Shala v Birmingham City Council [2007] EWCA Civ 624, [2008] HLR 8, CA. Whether or not a personal examination is required will depend on the particular facts. See khelassi v Brent London Borough Council [2006] EWCA Civ 1825, (2007) February Legal Action, p 31, CA (where there had been a personal medical examination); Shala v Birmingham City Council [2007] EWCA Civ 624, [2008] HLR 8, CA (where the local housing authority was required to bear in mind that its medical adviser had not examined the applicant); Wandsworth London Borough Council v Allison [2008] EWCA Civ 554, [2008] June Legal Action, p 33, CA (where a personal examination was not necessary); and R (Bauer-Czarnomski) v Ealing London Borough Council [2010] EWHC 130 (Admin), (2010) March Legal Action, p 30, Admin Ct (a judicial review claim relating to an application for an allocation of social housing, see 4.98–4.100).

9.75 If there are differences of opinion between the local housing authority’s medical advisers and the medical opinion put forward on behalf of the applicant, the local housing authority should seek an explanation for those differences.2 The local housing authority should also take into account differences in medical expertise when trying to reconcile conflicting medical opinions. An adverse medical opinion, including one from the applicant’s own doctor(s), should normally be put to the applicant for comment. So too should any medical advice that raises new issues or contentious points. Where a local housing authority’s policy was to ‘encourage persons who have any knowledge of an applicant’s medical or social history to attend’ the decision-making panel, and the applicant’s doctor had expressed a wish to attend, the local housing authority was severely criticised by the Local Government Ombudsman for failing to invite the doctor. The final decision (for example, as to whether or not an applicant is vulnerable) is for the local housing authority, not for the medical adviser, but normally the medical adviser should be asked to address the relevant statutory test (such as vulnerability).3

9.75 Inquiries and Decisions

5 Complaint against Waltham Forest London Borough Council, 03/A/15819, 9 November 2005.

9.76 When the local housing authority is assessing whether an applicant is ‘vulnerable’, and care, health or other support needs are identified in the course of that assessment, the local housing authority should liaise with adult care services and health authorities, where appropriate, as part of its inquiries. It may be necessary to obtain an assessment from the relevant specialist authority. Medical reports obtained as part of an assessment by the Department for Work and Pensions, of a person’s entitlement for specific welfare benefits, may be taken into account, but the local housing authority must bear in mind that assessment of entitlement to benefits is a wholly different exercise from assessment of priority need.

1 English Code, para 8.25; Welsh Code, para 16.16.

9.77 One judge said, in a case where the applicant was a former asylum-seeker who suffered from a number of mental health conditions:

‘Where mental health issues and issues arising from historic mistreatment of former asylum seeker are concerned, the housing authority should normally consult with the applicant’s medical advisers, both present and past and with the relevant mental health services and will usually seek [to] obtain a further assessment and report from a psychiatrist. Where, as in this case, it appears that the applicant is depressed, alone, unable readily to cope with day-to-day living tasks, unemployed and possibly unemployable, has no settled links with England or the English way of life and has minimal support mechanisms at his disposal, the inquiries would be expected to extend to a detailed inquiry into the applicant’s way of life prior to his homelessness.’

1 R (IA) v Westminster City Council [2013] EWHC 1273 (QB), (2013) July/August Legal Action, p 23 per HHJ Anthony Thornton QC, sitting as a deputy High Court judge, at [25]. The judge also said that, where the applicant is a former asylum-seeker: ‘[t]he decision-maker should . . . have sought details of the case presented to the UK Border Agency that led to the claimant being granted asylum, of the nature and contents of the psychiatric assessment and treatment he had previously received, of the reasons for the proposed counselling, of the reasons why the landlord had terminated the claimant’s tenancy and of any independent evidence of the claimant’s living difficulties’ at [29].
9.78 The Court of Appeal has considered the issue of the use, by local housing authorities, of medical advisers. It held: ‘It is entirely right that local authority officers, themselves without any medical expertise, should not be expected to make their own critical evaluation of applicants’ medical evidence and should have access to specialist advice about it. What would not be acceptable is seeking out advisers to support a refusal of priority need housing wherever possible.’

The Court of Appeal went on to remind local housing authorities that it is not the medical advisers but the local housing authorities that have the task of determining whether an applicant has a priority need (or any other medically related question). It is appropriate for medical advisers to be asked to address the specific issue which the local housing authority has to decide, and to furnish material within their professional competence which addresses that issue. It has also reminded local housing authorities that, unless their medical adviser has personally examined the applicant, his or her opinion cannot be considered expert evidence of the applicant’s condition.

2 Shala v Birmingham City Council [2007] EWCA Civ 624, [2008] HLR 8, CA at [19] per Sedley LJ. An attempt to argue that the particular medical adviser’s organisation was ‘biased in favour of their paymasters’ received short shrift from the Court of Appeal in Harper v Oxford City Council [2007] EWCA Civ 1169, (2008) January Legal Action, p 37, CA. In Oyebanji v Waltham Forest London Borough Council, 22 August 2013, Central London County Court, (2014) February Legal Action, p 31, the local housing authority had been wrong in law to prefer the opinion of a psychiatrist who had not seen the applicant over the evidence of a practising psychotherapist who saw her regularly. See also 12.92–12.101.

9.79 In a separate case, the Court of Appeal has held that the role of a medical adviser is to comment ‘on the medical evidence in order to enable the local authority to understand the medical issues and to evaluate for itself the evidence before it as to [the applicant’s] medical condition’. In that case, it was not appropriate for the medical adviser to have examined the applicant personally.

9.80 An application to the Court of Appeal for permission to bring a second appeal, on the grounds that those two decisions of the Court of Appeal were inconsistent, was refused. The judge said: ‘I do not see any inconsistency between the two decisions in [Birmingham City Council v Shala and [Wandsworth London Borough Council v Allison. In Allison the Court of Appeal helpfully set out the kind of assistance that a local authority’s in-house medical adviser can give. In Shala, on the other hand, the Court of Appeal pointed out the limitations which exist if the in-house medical adviser instead of assisting the local authority to understand the medical expert seeks to offer conflicting expert opinion.’

9.80 Inquiries and Decisions

Public sector equality duty

9.81 If some feature of the evidence presented raises a possibility that the applicant, or other relevant person, might have a ‘disability’, and that this might be relevant to the issue under consideration, the decision-maker must comply with the requirements of the Equality Act 2010 and take account of that disability. The same applies to any other protected characteristic that might be relevant to the issue being inquired into.

1 Equality Act 2010, s 149. See English Code, para 8.17; and 12.91, 12.100, 13.70 and 18.65–18.68 of this book.
2 The relevant protected characteristics are: age; disability; gender reassignment; pregnancy and maternity; race; religion or belief; sex; sexual orientation: Equality Act 2010, s 149(7).

9.82 A ‘disability’ is defined at Equality Act 2010, s 6, as ‘a physical or mental impairment’ which ‘has a substantial and long-term adverse effect on P’s ability to carry out normal day-to-day activities’. Where the issue of disability is raised, local housing authorities should:

‘focus very sharply on (i) whether the applicant is under a disability (or has another relevant protected characteristic), (ii) the extent of such disability, (iii) the likely effect of the disability, when taken together with any other features, on the applicant.’

1 Equality Act 2010, s 6. ‘Substantial’ means ‘more than minor or trivial’: Equality Act 2010, s 212. The effect of an impairment is long-term if (a) it has lasted for at least 12 months, (b) it is likely to last for at least 12 months or (c) it is likely to last for the rest of the life of the person affected: Equality Act, Sch 1 para 1. Addiction to alcohol, nicotine or any other substance is to be treated as not amounting to an impairment, unless the addiction was originally the result of the administration of medically prescribed drugs or other medical treatment: Equality Act 2010 (Disability) Regulations, SI 2010/2128, reg 3. Cancer, HIV infection and multiple sclerosis are each deemed to be disabilities: Equality Act 2010, Sch 1, para 6.

9.83 The issue of whether or not an applicant, or other member of the applicant’s household is disabled, might relate to whether or not the applicant has a priority need because he or she, or a member of his or her household is vulnerable, whether the applicant has become homeless intentionally, whether the applicant is occupying suitable accommodation or to any other points.

Inquiries into applications 9.86

Relevance of support

9.84 Particular inquiries may be necessary in order to decide whether an applicant, who has been receiving support from a third party, is vulnerable. Local housing authorities should not assume that the possibility or existence of support means that the applicant is not vulnerable. Rather, a local housing authority should inquire into whether the support will be available on a consistent and predictable basis. If so, the local housing authority should then consider whether the support will be sufficient to prevent the applicant from being vulnerable. Unless both of those questions are answered in the affirmative, then the applicant will be vulnerable.

1 HA 1996, s 189(1)(c), see 12.76–12.125; H(W)A 2014, ss 70(1)(c) and 71, see 12.199–12.206.

Overcrowded accommodation

9.85 If an applicant claims that his or her present or previous accommodation is or was overcrowded, and therefore not reasonable for him or her to continue to occupy, the local housing authority must make inquiries to determine whether the accommodation is or was overcrowded and, if so, to what extent. Where there is a dispute as to the size, space or arrangement of the accommodation, inquiries should be made so that the local housing authority can make its own decision on the disputed issues.

2 R v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council ex p Silchenstedt (1997) 29 HLR 728, QBD.

Best interests of any children

9.86 The Children Act 2004 requires all local authorities, including local housing authorities, to discharge their functions having regard to the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of children. This duty is colloquially referred to as the ‘best interests’ duty. Whilst the duty does not arise in all of the decisions that a local housing authority has to make, the Supreme Court has held that it will always arise when offers of accommodation are made to applicants whose households include minor children. Local housing authorities are required to consider the significance of any disruption caused by the location of the accommodation to the education of the applicant or any member of his or her household. The Supreme Court has held that it is not enough for a decision-maker simply to ask whether any of the children are approaching their GCSE or other externally assessed examinations. The decision-maker should identify the principal needs of the children, both individually and collectively, and have regard to the need to safeguard and promote the children’s welfare. The local housing authority should also explain, either by reference to a published policy, or in its decision letter, the choices made about the location of accommodation (or any other factors...
9.86 Inquiries and Decisions relating to suitability) that affect the welfare of the children⁵.

1 Children Act 2004, s 11(2) for local authorities in England; s 28(2) for local authorities in Wales.

2 It will not affect, for example, whether or not an applicant has become homeless intentionally: Huzrat v Hounslow London Borough Council [2013] EWCA Civ 1865, [2014] HLR 17, CA, see 13.169.

4 Homelessness (Suitability of Accommodation) (England) Order 2012, SI 2012/2601, art 2(b), see 18.48–18.61; Homelessness (Suitability of Accommodation) (Wales) Order 2015/1268, art 3(f), see 18.48 and 18.60–18.64.

9.87 The Administrative Court has considered the position of school-age children who are being accommodated, by a local housing authority, outside of the local housing authority’s district and may have to change schools. In those cases, the local housing authority must have contemporary records showing that it evaluated the likely impact of transfer on the educational welfare of the child, and how it conducted that evaluation. It must be able to show that it had liaised with the education department of the receiving local housing authority and that it had satisfied that adequate educational arrangements had been, or would be, put in place⁵.

Additional matters for assessment

9.88 Local housing authorities in both England and Wales are now required to consider a number of additional issues. The local housing authority must assess:

(a) the circumstances that have caused the applicant to be homeless or threatened with homelessness;
(b) the housing needs of the applicant and of any members of his or her household;
(c) the support needed for the applicant and for his or her household in order to retain accommodation which is or may become available⁶.

1 HA 1996, s 189A(2), inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; see English Code, chapter 11, and see 15.67–15.69; H(W)A 2014, s 62(5)(a), (b) and (c); Welsh Code, paras 10.21–10.29, see 9.13.

DECISIONS ON APPLICATIONS

Overview

9.89 Once the local housing authority has completed its inquiries into an application, it is required to notify the applicant of its decision (in England) or of the outcome of its assessment (in Wales)⁶. Every application therefore results in notification of a decision. As a result of the new focus in both England and Wales of early intervention, and the new duties so that all eligible applicants are now helped to prevent their own homelessness, or to find suitable accommodation, local housing authorities are now likely to notify an applicant of a series of decisions, rather than just one decision. Those decisions will include:

- a decision that the applicant is ineligible for assistance;
- a decision that the applicant is eligible for assistance and is threatened with homelessness or is homeless, so that the HA 1996, s 195(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 68(1) prevention or HA 1996, s 189B(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty is owed;
- a decision that the HA 1996, s 195(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 68(1) prevention or HA 1996, s 189B(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty has come to an end; and
- a decision as to what duty, if any, is subsequently owed to the applicant.

Notification of decisions

The requirements as to the content of the decision or decisions are given in HA 1996, s 184, or H(W)A 2014, s 63. For local housing authorities in England, the colloquialism ‘a section 184 notice’ or ‘section 184 letter’ is commonly used to refer to a local housing authority’s notification of a decision on an application. There is no question of applicants being given the result informally in lieu of a written notification. Every applicant, even if she or he is found to be not eligible or not homeless, is entitled to a written decision. Even those successful in their application obtain a written record of that
9.90 Inquiries and Decisions

success1. The English Code advises that notifications ‘should be clearly written in plain language’. They should include information about any rights to request a review, and the timescale in which to do so. The notifications might also include information about independent advice services that are available2.

The English Code also notes that more than one notification might be required, and sometimes those notifications could be combined in one letter3.

1 The Local Government Ombudsman found maladministration when a local housing authority failed to notify the applicant of the decision on his or her application for homelessness assistance. £200 was recommended as compensation for a failure to notify a HA 1996, s 184, decision at all: Investigation into complaint against Bristol City Council, 12 015 826, 4 July 2013, (2013) September Legal Action, p 30; and £750 was recommended for a failure to notify a decision and secure suitable interim accommodation: Investigation into complaint against London Borough of Newham, 13 005 484, 17 March 2014, (2014) June Legal Action, p 40.
2 English Code, para 18.29, see also Welsh Code, para 10.56.
3 English Code, para 18.31. Somewhat surprisingly, this is the only reference in the English Code to the likelihood that, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, there are likely to be more than one notification, or s 184 decision.

9.91 The local housing authority is under an obligation, when making its decision, to consider the facts and the law in existence at the date of the decision. This means that any change of circumstances between the date of the application for homelessness assistance and the date of the decision must be taken into account. So, where an applicant for homelessness assistance had obtained a suitable assured shorthold tenancy before the HA 1996, s 184 decision had been made, the local housing authority was entitled to decide that the applicant was not homeless1.

9.92 There is one circumstance in which it might be important to distinguish between the date on which the decision was actually made and the date when it was put in writing and ‘notified’ to the applicant. If either the facts or the law changes in an interval between the actual making of the decision and putting it in writing, it will be the facts and law that existed at the date of the actual making of the decision that are relevant, not those existing at the date of the written notification1.

9.93 In one case, the local housing authority concluded, on the day before an applicant’s eighteenth birthday, that she did not have a priority need. The decision was actually put in writing on the following day. The Court of Appeal held that the decision was made on the day before the birthday, and therefore, applying the facts and law at that date, the local housing authority should have concluded that the applicant had a priority need by reason of her age1.

9.94 However, time limits attaching to rights to request a review (and, subsequently, to appeal) run from the date when the written decision is ‘notified’ to the applicant1. This is likely to be a date different from, and later than, either the actual date of the decision, or the date of the written decision. Notification refers to receipt of the decision by the applicant or by his or her agents, not the date on the letter. If the notification is not actually received by the applicant, then it is treated as having been given to him or her if it is made available at the local housing authority’s office for a reasonable period for collection by the applicant or by his or her agents. In those circumstances, the date of notification would be the end of the reasonable period.

Time in which to notify decisions

9.95 There is no statutory time limit within which the decision reached on the application must be notified. HA 1996, Pt 7 assumes that notice of the decision will be given by the local housing authorities ‘on completing their inquiries’, which suggests immediately. That formulation also does not take account of the likelihood that the applicant may now be notified of more than one decision. The present English Code reproduces the statutory formula: notification of a decision must be given ‘when a housing authority has completed its inquiries’. The Welsh Code recommends that local housing authorities should aim to complete each stage of the assessment and notify the applicant of the decision as soon as possible, and that in most cases this should be achieved within 10 working days. The emphasis, however, is on the correctness of the decision and the recommended timescale could be extended where the case is complex or information is difficult to clarify.

1 See 9.50–9.52.
2 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
3 HA 1996, s 184(3). H(W)A 2014, s 63(1) uses the formulation ‘notify the applicant of the outcome of its assessment’.
6 Welsh Code, paras 10.5 and 10.54.

9.96 The only recommended timescale in the English Code refers to the decision as to what duty, if any, might be owed to the applicant when the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty comes to an end, and if the applicant remains homeless and has a priority need. In those circumstances, the English Code advises that local housing authorities should not delay completing their inquiries. It may be possible to notify the applicant the day after the 56-day period for the performance of the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty ie on the 57th day. If significant further investigations are required, the English Code advises that inquiries should be completed and a decision notified within a maximum of 15 working days (which would be three weeks) after the end of the 56-day period.

Sequence of decisions

9.97 As a result of the new duties on local housing authorities in both England and Wales to help all applicants who are eligible for assistance and are either threatened with homelessness or homeless, it seems likely that local housing authorities will have to notify the applicant of a series of decisions. Those decisions include:

• a decision that the applicant is ineligible for assistance;
• a decision that the applicant is eligible for assistance and is threatened with homelessness or is homeless, so that the HA 1996, s 195(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 66(1) prevention or HA 1996, s 189B(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty is owed;
• a decision that the HA 1996, s 195(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 66(1) prevention or HA 1996, s 189B(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty has come to an end; and
• a decision as to what duty, if any, is subsequently owed to the applicant.

As inserted by HRA 2017 s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 15.138–15.195.

As inserted by HRA 2017 s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 15.151–15.189; H(W)A 2014, s 67, see 17.56–17.72, and H(W)A 2014, s 74, see 17.84–17.119.
9.98 The first decision for local housing authorities in both England and Wales will be whether the applicant is eligible for assistance. If the applicant is not eligible, the decision must be notified to him or her with reasons. If the local housing authority had been accommodating the applicant, under its interim accommodation duty, because it had reason to believe that the applicant may be eligible for assistance, may be homeless and may have a priority need, notification of this decision will bring the interim accommodation duty to an end.

9.99 If the applicant is eligible, the local housing authority will then consider what duty, if any, is owed to the applicant. This will require, in the first instance, consideration of whether the applicant is homeless or threatened with homelessness. If the applicant is neither homeless nor threatened with homelessness, the decision that no duty is owed will be notified to the applicant with reasons. If the local housing authority had been accommodating the applicant, under its interim accommodation duty, because it had reason to believe that the applicant may be eligible for assistance, may be homeless and may have a priority need, notification of this decision will bring the interim accommodation duty to an end.

9.100 If the applicant is either threatened with homelessness or homeless, a local housing authority in England will owe him or her two duties:

- A duty to make an assessment of the applicant’s case; and
- A duty to help the applicant prevent his or her homelessness, or to help the applicant secure accommodation.

This decision that these two duties are owed must be notified to the applicant. There is no requirement to give reasons for the decision.
9.100 Inquiries and Decisions

4 HA 1996, s 184(3).
5 Because the statutory formulation is ‘so far as any issue is decided against his interests, inform him of the reasons for their decision’: HA 1996, s 184(3).

9.101 If the local housing authority in England has decided that the applicant is eligible for assistance and is homeless, and that the conditions are met for the applicant to be referred to another local housing authority for performance of the relief duty, that decision must be notified to the applicant with reasons.

1 HA 1996, s 198(A1), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(8), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; see 15.139–15.146. There is no right for the applicant to request a review of this decision to refer: HA 1996, s 202(1) (as amended by HRA 2017, s 9, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) does not include this decision in the list of decisions which can be subject to a request for a review.

9.102 Subsequently, local housing authorities will notify the applicant of its decision that either the HA 1996, s 195(2)1 or H(W)A 2014, s 66(1)2, prevention duty or the HA 1996, s 189B(2)3 or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1)4, relief duty has come to an end5. This decision must be notified with reasons6. The only exception is where the HA 1996, s 189B(2)7, relief duty has come to an end after 56 days8 and the applicant remains homeless and the local housing authority is satisfied that he or she has a priority need and is not satisfied that he or she has become homeless intentionally, so the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty will be owed9. The decision that the HA 1996, s 189B(2)10, relief duty has come to an end in these circumstances need not be notified11. However, the applicant will be notified of the subsequent decision that the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty is owed to him or her12.

Decisions on applications 9.105

9.103 If the applicant remains, or there is the local housing authority has reason to believe that the applicant may be homeless, a local housing authority will have to notify the applicant of what duty, if any, is now owed to the applicant. That might be notification of a decision that the applicant is not homeless.

2 HA 1996, s 184(1)(b) and (3); H(W)A 2014, ss 62(9) and 63(1).

9.104 If the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant is homeless, and that the HA 1996, s 189B(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty has come to an end, there will then be consideration of whether the applicant has a priority need, whether he or she has become homeless intentionally and the circumstances in which the HA 1996, s 189B(2), or H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty came to an end. If any of those decisions are decided against the applicant’s interests, the decision must be notified with reasons.

4 See 17.73–17.143.

5 For local housing authorities in England, the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty to the applicant will not be owed if the HA 1996, s 189B(2) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) relief duty came to an end because the applicant refused a final accommodation or final Pt 6 offer: HA 1996, s 189B(9)(a) and 193A (as inserted by HRA 2017, ss 5(2) and 7(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018), see 15.181–15.188. For local housing authorities in Wales, the H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty will not be owed if the H(W)A 2014, s 73(1) relief duty came to an end as a result of the applicant having refused an offer of suitable accommodation: H(W)A 2014, ss 74(5) and 75(1). See 17.109–17.117 and 17.146.

6 HA 1996, s 184(1)(b) and (3); H(W)A 2014, s 63(1).

9.105 For local housing authorities in England, the decision might be one of the following:

- That the applicant is homeless but he or she does not have a priority need, so no further duty is owed;
- That the applicant is homeless and has a priority need and the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty came to an end because the applicant refused a final accommodation duty or final Pt 6 offer, so the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty is not owed;
- That the applicant is homeless and has a priority need and has become homeless intentionally, so the short-term duty to accommodate at HA 1996, s 190(2), is owed;
- That the applicant is homeless and has a priority need, and has not become homeless intentionally, and the local housing authority has notified him or her of a decision that he or she has deliberately and unreasonably refused to co-operate, so that the accommodation duty at HA 1996, s 193C is owed;
9.105 Inquiries and Decisions

- That the applicant is homeless and has a priority need and has not become homeless intentionally and that the local housing authority consider that the conditions are met for referral of the applicant’s case to another local housing authority, and that it intends to notify or has notified the other local housing authority of that decision; or
- That the applicant is homeless and has a priority need, so the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty is owed.

Because the duties owed after the HA 1996, s 189B(2) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) relief duty comes to an end are only owed to applicants who have a priority need.

9.106 The English Code advises that local housing authorities in England should not issue a decision that the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty will be owed until the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty has come to an end. The advice also states that if a duty under HA 1996, s 190(2), will be owed (because the applicant has a priority need but has become homeless intentionally), that decision might be notified during the performance of the relief duty, so that the applicant is aware that the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty will not be owed.

- That the applicant is homeless but he or she does not have a priority need, so no further duty is owed;
Decisions on applications 9.108

- That the applicant is homeless and has a priority need and the H(W)A 2014, s 73(1) relief duty came to an end because the applicant has suitable accommodation available for his or her occupation or refused an offer of suitable accommodation\(^2\) and so the H(W)A 2014, s 75(1) main housing duty is not owed\(^1\);
- That the applicant is homeless and has a priority need and has become homeless intentionally, so the short-term duty to accommodate is owed\(^4\);
- That the applicant is homeless and has a priority need and has not become homeless intentionally and that the local housing authority consider that the conditions are met for referral of the applicant's case to another local housing authority, and that it intends to notify or has notified the other local housing authority of that decision\(^5\); or
- That the applicant is homeless and has a priority need, and has not become homeless intentionally, so the H(W)A 2014, s 75(1) main housing duty is owed\(^6\).

1 Because the duties owed after the H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), relief duty comes to an end are only owed to applicants who have a priority need.

Contents of decision

9.108 The decision (in England) or outcome of the assessment (in Wales) must be put in writing\(^1\). If any issue has been decided against the applicant's interests, the local housing authority must not only notify that decision but also inform the applicant in writing of the reasons for its decision\(^2\). The duty to give reasons applies to all decisions that the local housing authority is obliged to make on an application (decisions as to whether the applicant is ‘eligible’, whether a duty is owed, and, if so, what duty) and to any decision that it chooses to make as to whether the applicant has a local connection\(^3\). However, to make sense in practice, this obligation is interpreted to mean that any adverse finding on any issue decided in the course of working out what duty is owed must be explained by reasons. Therefore, it is not sufficient for a local housing authority in England simply to notify a positive decision that the duty owed is the limited duty in HA 1996, s 190(2)\(^4\). It must explain, with reasons, why the applicant is not owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty\(^5\).

1 HA 1996, s 184(6) and English Code, para 18.29; H(W)A 2014, s 63(4)(b) and Welsh Code, para 10.53.
2 HA 1996, s 184(3) and English Code, para 18.33; H(W)A 2014, s 63(1) and Welsh Code, para 10.56.
3 HA 1996, s 184(4), H(W)A 2014, s 63(3). Where a local housing authority found that an applicant did not have a priority need, but failed to make any decision as to whether or not he was homeless, the Local Government Ombudsman said that the decision was defective: Complaint against Waltham Forest London Borough Council, 03/A/15819, 9 November 2003, Annual Digest of Cases 2005/06, LGO.
4 As amended by HRA 2017, s 5(5), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, duty to accommodate owed to applicants who are homeless, eligible for assistance, have a priority need, have become homeless intentionally and in respect of whom the HA 1996, s 189B(2) (as inserted by HRA
9.108 Inquiries and Decisions

2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) relief duty has come to an end: HA 1996, s 190(1).

9.109 The decision is limited to whether or not the statutory criteria are met and, as a result of those findings, what duty (if any) is owed to the applicant. The local housing authority cannot impose further requirements on an applicant or suggest that a duty is conditional upon the applicant doing something, such as surrendering an existing tenancy.

Although the assessment of the applicant’s case will contain much broader information: HA 1996, s 189A(1)-(3) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) for local housing authorities in England, see 15.62-15.86; H(W)A 2014, s 62 for local housing authorities in Wales, see 9.12-9.14.

9.110 Whether the decision notified by the local housing authority is favourable or unfavourable, the notification letter must inform the applicant of his or her right to request a review and also of the 21-day period within which any request for a review must be made.

9.111 All decisions that are required to be notified in writing must also contain reasons for any issue that was decided against an applicant’s interests. The Codes recommend that the reasons for the decision are explained clearly and fully and that any assistance that can be made available to the applicant is also clearly set out. If the applicant has difficulty in understanding the decision, the local housing authority should consider arranging for a member of staff to explain the decision in person.

Reasons

9.112 The reasons given must be proper, intelligible and adequate and relate to the substantive issues raised by the applicant. An applicant is entitled to reasons so that he or she can understand, clearly, why he or she has not succeeded and can properly assess any prospects of challenging that decision. In addition, adequate reasons serve to indicate that:

“... the decision-maker has gone through the right process of thinking in arriving at its conclusion.”

Reasons in the s 184 decision also permit the applicant to address them in his or her request for a review: Connors v Birmingham City Council (2010) May Legal Action, p 25, Birmingham County Court.

9.113 It is important, when considering whether or not the reasons are proper, intelligible and adequate, to read the decision letter as a whole. The court should not take an over-technical or over-critical approach. Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury said in Holmes-Moorhouse v Richmond upon Thames Royal London Borough Council:

‘a judge should not adopt an unfair or unrealistic approach when considering or interpreting such review decisions. Although they may often be checked by people with legal experience or qualifications before they are sent out, review decisions are prepared by housing officers, who occupy a post of considerable responsibility and who have substantial experience in the housing field, but they are not lawyers. It is not therefore appropriate to subject their decisions to the same sort of analysis as may be applied to a contract drafted by solicitors, to an Act of Parliament, or to a court’s judgment.’

1 Holmes-Moorhouse v Richmond-upon-Thames Royal London Borough Council [2009] UKHL 7, [2009] 1 WLR 413, HL, at [47]. The point applies to all decisions, not just to review decisions.

9.114 He added:

‘Accordingly, a benevolent approach should be adopted to the interpretation of review decisions. The court should not take too technical a view of the language used, or search for inconsistencies, or adopt a nit-picking approach, when confronted with an appeal against a review decision. That is not to say that the court should approve incomprehensible or misguided reasoning, but it should be realistic and practical in its approach to the interpretation of review decisions.

Further . . . a decision can often survive despite the existence of an error in the reasoning advanced to support it. For example, sometimes the error is irrelevant to the outcome; sometimes it is too trivial (objectively, or in the eyes of the decision-maker) to affect the outcome; sometimes it is obvious from the rest of the reasoning, read as a whole, that the decision would have been the same notwithstanding the error; sometimes, there is more than one reason for the conclusion, and the error only undermines one of the reasons; sometimes, the decision is the only one which could rationally have been reached.’

1 Holmes-Moorhouse v Richmond-upon-Thames Royal London Borough Council [2009] UKHL 7, [2009] 1 WLR 413, HL, at [50]–[51]. Again, the point applies to all decisions, not just to review decisions.

9.115 The Supreme Court considered the duty to give reasons in two cases decided in 2015. In the case of Hotak v Southwark London Borough Council, Kanu v Southwark London Borough Council, Johnson v Solihull Metropolitan Borough Council Lord Neuberger said that he strongly maintained the views he had expressed in Holmes-Moorhouse v Richmond upon Thames Royal London Borough Council, but that, in cases where the public sector equality duty is engaged, the decision or review decision should show that the decision-maker had sharply focused on the duty, and on any relevant protected characteristic.

9.116 In Nzolameso v Westminster City Council¹, Baroness Hale said²:

‘it must be clear from the decision that proper consideration has been given to the relevant matters required by [HA 1996] and the Code. While the court should not adopt an overly technical or “nit-picking” approach to the reasons given in the decision, these do have to be adequate to fulfil their basic function. It has long been established that an obligation to give reasons for a decision is imposed so that the persons affected by the decision may know why they have won or lost and, in particular, may be able to judge whether the decision is valid and therefore unchallengeable or invalid and therefore open to challenge . . . Nor, without a proper explanation, can the court know whether the authority have properly fulfilled their statutory obligations.’

9.117 In Poshteh v Kensington & Chelsea Royal London Borough Council³, Lord Carnwath JSC, giving the leading judgment, reiterated the warning in Holmes-Moorhouse v Richmond upon Thames London Borough Council⁴. The decision, read as a whole, must address the relevant issues, including those required under the Equality Act 2010⁵, but care must be taken not to engage in ‘over-zealous linguistic analysis’.

1. [2017] UKSC 30, [2017] 2 WLR 1417, SC.

9.118 Merely reciting the relevant legal formula set out in HA 1996, Pt 7, or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, and stating that the applicant does not meet it, will not amount to giving adequate and sufficient reasons. For example, where a local housing authority is satisfied that an applicant has become homeless intentionally, the decision letter should state:

(1) when the local housing authority considers that the applicant became homeless;
(2) why he or she become homeless;
(3) whether the loss of accommodation was caused by the deliberate act (or failure to act) on the part of the applicant, including consideration of whether the applicant was ignorant of a relevant fact in good faith;
(4) whether the accommodation lost was ‘available’ for the applicant’s occupation;
(5) why it would have been reasonable for the applicant to have continued to occupy the accommodation; and
Decisions on applications

whether the applicant’s current homelessness was caused by his or her intentional conduct or whether the causal chain has been broken by subsequent events.\(^6\)

\(^1\) As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

\(^5\) R v Gloucester City Council ex p Miles (1985) 17 HLR 292, CA.

9.119 The deliberate act or omission of the applicant which is said to have caused the homelessness should be identified, even though the findings can be expressed simply and briefly. Where the central issue is whether it would have been reasonable for the applicant to have continued to occupy the previous accommodation, the decision letter should state what factors were considered in deciding that it would have been reasonable to continue to occupy and specifically address the reasons given by the applicant for leaving.\(^1\)

\(^1\) R v Hillingdon London Borough Council ex p H (1988) 20 HLR 554, QBD.

9.120 Where the issue of whether the accommodation is, or was, reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy requires consideration of whether he or she could afford to pay the rent, the decision letter should set out any amounts of the applicant’s expenditure which the local housing authority considered to be excessive or unnecessary. In some cases, where the applicant has produced and relied on a justification for the expenditure, a more detailed explanation of the reasons for rejecting that material may be required. Where the local housing authority had concluded that it was not probable that the applicant would be at risk of violence if she had continued to occupy the accommodation, its decision was deficient in that it did not explain why it had come to that conclusion given the applicant’s account that she had seen her violent husband in the area of her accommodation.\(^3\)

\(^2\) HA 1996, s 177(1), see 10.79–10.91 (England); H(W)A 2014, s 57(1), see 10.79–10.80 and 10.97–10.98 (Wales).

9.121 Where there are medical issues, the decision letter should give reasons for rejecting any medical opinions.\(^3\)

\(^1\) R v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council ex p Campbell (1995) 28 HLR 160, QBD. In Al-Kabi v Southwark London Borough Council, (2008) March Legal Action, p 21, Lambeth County Court, a decision letter was found to be defective for its failure to mention the medical evidence at all, and no reasons were given for the local housing authority’s decision to reject the undisputed medical evidence.
9.122 Inquiries and Decisions

9.122 Where a local housing authority has made a decision that its duty to the applicant has come to an end, as a result of the applicant’s refusal of suitable accommodation¹, and the offer of accommodation was located outside of its district, the issue may be whether or not that accommodation was suitable for the needs of the applicant and of his or her household². Any decision that the accommodation is or was suitable should set out what accommodation was available in the local housing authority’s district or why no such accommodation had been offered. It should also show that the decision-maker was aware that, if it is not reasonably practicable to offer accommodation in the local housing authority’s own district, the obligation is to offer accommodation as near as possible to that district. In addition, the Supreme Court has recommended that local housing authorities adopt policies for procuring sufficient units of accommodation which set out how those units will be allocated. Where there is an anticipated shortfall of accommodation in the local housing authority’s district, the policy should explain the factors which will be taken into account in offering accommodation outside of the district³. A decision letter should also demonstrate that a local housing authority, when placing families with school-age children in another local housing authority’s district, has made satisfactory arrangements to safeguard a child’s educational welfare, and specifically show that the local housing authority has liaised with the education department of the receiving local authority and satisfied itself that educational arrangements are in place⁴.

² As required by HA 1996, s 206(1), see 18.48–18.61 (England); (H/W)A 2014, Pr 2, see 18.48, 18.60–18.64 (Wales).

⁴ R (E) v Islington London Borough Council [2017] EWHC 1440 (Admin), Admin Ct see 18.57.

9.123 The decision letter should address any issues raised that fall within the public sector equality duty⁵ and show that the decision-maker had sharply focused on the relevant protected characteristics and the issues raised relating to the characteristic⁶. However, a failure expressly to mention the public sector equality duty will not necessarily mean that the decision-maker has failed to comply with the duty if the decision, read as a whole, shows that the decision-maker had addressed the relevant questions⁷.

¹ Equality Act 2010, s 149, see 9.81–9.83, 12.91, 12.100, 13.70, 18.65–18.68.

9.124 Where there are contradictory factual accounts put before the local housing authority, and it prefers one account to another, the decision letter should explain that that was the case, and why a particular account was preferred. If a decision letter fails to refer to part of the applicant’s case, the inference will be that the local housing authority has failed to have regard to that matter.

9.125 Notifications of decisions that the duty has come to an end must also include the reasons for the decision, and inform the applicant of his or her right to request a review of the decision and of the time within which the request must be made.

1 For local housing authorities in England: HA 1996, ss 189B(6), 193B(3) and 195(7) (as inserted and amended by HRA 2017 ss 4(2), 5(2) and 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) and English Code, paras 18.34–18.35; H(W)A 2014, s 84(1) and Welsh Code, paras 15.94–15.95.

The special rules for notifying decisions which involve restricted persons

9.126 There is an additional notification duty on local housing authorities where:

(1) the applicant’s household includes a restricted person; and
(2) the local housing authority has decided that the HA 1996, s 193(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty, is only owed because of the presence of the restricted person.

1 HA 1996, s 184(3A) and (7); H(W)A 2014, s 63(2) and (5). For ‘restricted person’, see 9.54–9.56 and 11.163–11.167.
2 See 16.94–16.199.
3 See 17.146–17.199.

9.127 In those circumstances, the applicant becomes a ‘restricted case’. There is a requirement on local housing authorities to bring the HA 1996, s 193(2), or H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty, or the duty to secure accommodation, to an end by making a private rented sector offer, so far as reasonably practicable.

1 HA 1996, s 193(3B), see 16.180–16.185; H(W)A 2014, s 76(5), see 17.177.
2 HA 1996, s 193(7AD); H(W)A 2014, s 76(5).

9.128 The additional notification duty only arises if:

• the local housing authority decides that the applicant is, or would be, owed the HA 1996, s 193(2), or H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty; and
• that duty is only owed to the applicant because of the presence of the restricted person in the applicant’s household.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 75(2), see 17.146–17.199.
2 HA 1996, s 184(3A); H(W)A 2014 s 63(2).

9.129 If those two conditions are met, the local housing authority must:
9.129 Inquiries and Decisions

- inform the applicant that the decision that he or she is, or will be, owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty was reached having regard to the restricted person in the applicant’s household;
- include the name of the restricted person;
- explain why the person is a restricted person; and
- explain the effect of the modification to the HA 1996, s 193(2), or H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), main housing duty as a result of HA 1996, s 193(7AD), or H(W)A 2014, s 76(5).

1 HA 1996, s 184(3A); H(W)A 2014, s 63(2). For the modification to the main housing duty in England as a result of HA 1996, s 193(7AD) and s 195(4A), see 16.180–16.185. For the modification in Wales, at H(W)A 2014, s 76(5), see 17.177.

9.130 The additional notification duty does not apply in all cases where the applicant’s household includes a restricted person. If the HA 1996, s 193(2), or H(W)A 2014, s 75(1) main housing duty to secure accommodation for applicants who have a priority need1, is not owed, the additional notification duty does not apply. Nor does it apply if those duties would have arisen despite the presence in the applicant’s household of a restricted person.2

The special rules for notification of a decision that the applicant has deliberately and unreasonably refused to co-operate

Local housing authorities in England

9.131 Where local housing authorities in England owe an applicant a HA 1996, s 195(2) prevention or a HA 1996, s 189B(2)2, relief duty, those duties can come to an end where a local housing authority notifies an applicant of a decision that he or she has deliberately and unreasonably refused to co-operate1. That notification cannot be given unless:

- the local housing authority has first given the applicant a warning that he or she has deliberately and unreasonably refused to take any steps that he or she had agreed to take under the personalised housing plan, or that had been recorded by the local housing authority in the personalised housing plan as a step that it would be reasonable to require the applicant to take;4
- the warning states that, if the applicant deliberately and unreasonably refuses to take any of these steps after receiving the warning, the local housing authority intends to give the notice that of its decision that he or she has deliberately and unreasonably refused to co-operate;5
- the warning explains the consequences of giving such notice, ie that the relevant duty will come to an end; and
- a reasonable period has elapsed since the warning was given.6

See HA 1996, s 189A(4) and (6), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018 for the steps that an applicant has agreed to take or is recorded as required by the local housing authority to take. See 15.207.

9.132 The local housing authority can subsequently give a notice to the applicant of its decision that the applicant has deliberately and unreasonably refused to take any step1. That notice must contain reasons for the local housing authority’s decision, explain the effect of the decision and inform the applicant that he or she has the right to request a review of the decision2. The notice cannot be given to the applicant until a reasonable period has elapsed since the warning was given, so that the applicant has time to comply with the warning3. The English Code advises that there is no set reasonable period but local housing authorities should ensure sufficient time is given to allow the applicant to rectify the non-co-operation. The length of the reasonable period will therefore vary according to the applicant’s particular needs and circumstances4.

1 HA 1996, s 193B(2), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or 3 April 2018; English Code paras 14.42 and 14.54–14.59. See 15.209.

4 English Code, para 14.44.

9.133 The consequences of a local housing authority notifying the applicant of a decision that he or she has deliberately and unreasonably failed to co-operate are that the HA 1996, s 195(2)1 prevention duty or the HA 1996, s 189B(2)2 relief duty owed to the applicant will come to an end3.

9.134 The local housing authority will then to notify the applicant as to what other duty, if any, is owed to him or her1. If the local housing authority is satisfied that an applicant is homeless, eligible for assistance, has a priority need and are satisfied that he or she has become homeless intentionally, the HA 1996, s 190(2)(a) short-term accommodation duty will arise2. If the local housing authority is satisfied that an applicant is homeless, eligible for assistance, has a priority need and are not satisfied that he or she has become homeless intentionally, the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty will not arise, but the local housing authority will owe the applicant a duty to secure accommodation under HA 1996, s 193C. That duty can be brought to an end if the applicant accepts or refuses a final accommodation offer of suitable accommodation (a fixed-term assured shorthold tenancy of at least six months) or a final Pt 6 offer, or in certain other circumstances.1

Local housing authorities in Wales

9.135 Local housing authorities in Wales can notify an applicant of a decision that it is satisfied that he or she is unreasonably failing to co-operate with it in connection in performance of any of the functions at H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.1

1 H(W)A 2014, s 79(5), see Welsh Code, paras 15.86–15.89; see 17.195–17.197. Note that the Welsh Code stresses that every effort to obtain the co-operation of the applicant should first be made: Welsh Code, para 15.87.

9.136 That decision must be notified to the applicant with the following information:

• that the local housing authority no longer regards itself as being subject to the relevant duty;
• the reasons for that decision;
• the applicant’s right to request a review of that decision; and
• the time within which the request for a review must be made.1

1 H(W)A 2014, s 84(1); Welsh Code, paras 15.93–15.98, see 17.195–17.197.

Insufficient reasons

9.137 A properly notified decision should give sufficient reasons for the applicant to understand why she or he has been unsuccessful on an issue and to enable the applicant to assess whether to make, and how best to frame, an application for review.1

1 See further discussion on ‘reasons’ at 9.111–9.125.

9.138 If the applicant considers that the reasoning given is insufficient to explain the decision, she or he could simply ignore the deficiency and apply for a review. If the reasons given in a subsequent review decision are sufficient, the failure to comply with the requirement to give reasons in the initial decision will generally be cured by the reasons in the review decision (but not always).2

1 See 19.12–19.85.
Decisions on applications 9.140

9.139 However, where the paucity of reasons in the initial decision means that the applicant cannot make a properly informed assessment as to whether to request a review, or how best to frame a review request, there will be a real need to secure the proper reasons. In the first instance, the applicant might simply ask the local housing authority to give, or to supplement, its reasons. If the local housing authority's response does not provide adequate reasons, then the applicant may want to seek a judicial review and a declaration that the obligation to give reasons has not been complied with, in breach of the legal requirement. The courts will be slow to intervene unless it is clear that the deficiency in the reasons is such as to render any attempt to use the statutory review mechanism unfair because the applicant simply does not know what was found against him or her, and what the case is that needs to be met. As a fall-back, to protect against the eventuality that the court may find the reasons adequate, the applicant may want to lodge a formal request for a review within the 21-day time limit and invite the local housing authority to defer the conclusion of the review until the outcome of the judicial review proceedings.

The effect of a decision

Local housing authorities in England

9.140 When a local housing authority in England has concluded its inquiries and notified the applicant of its decision as whether he or she is eligible, whether he or she is owed the HA 1996, s 195(2) prevention or HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty, then (unless the applicant requests a review of the decision) that can be the end of the immediate matters to be inquired into and notified to the applicant. Once the local housing authority has accepted a duty towards the applicant, it cannot subsequently reconsider its decision if the applicant's circumstances change (if, for example, he or she ceases to have a priority need). If, for a local housing authority in England, the HA 1996, s 184 decision has been obtained by the applicant's fraud or deception, or is the result of a fundamental mistake over the facts prevailing at the date of the decision, the local housing authority may revisit and re-open its decision. For local housing authorities in Wales, H(W)A 2014, s 79(3) permits a local housing authority to decide that its duty has come to an end if it is satisfied that a mistake of fact led to the applicant being notified that a duty was owed.
9.140 Inquiries and Decisions

3. R v Brent London Borough Council ex p Sadiq (2001) 33 HLR 47, QBD, unless the duty is that owed under HA 1996, s 193(2) and the change of circumstances is one of the events set out at HA 1996, s 193(6). See 16.124–16.141.

5. H(W)A 2014, s 79(3); Welsh Code, paras 15.80–15.83; see 17.193.

9.141 Once the notification has been given that a duty is owed, then the local housing authority has to ensure that it plays its part, by taking the reasonable steps which are recorded in the personalised housing plan, to help the applicant prevent his or her homelessness, or secure new accommodation. Those duties are conditional upon the applicant playing his or her part, so that if the applicant has deliberately and unreasonably refused to co-operate, the local housing authority can notify the applicant of its decision that the relevant duty had come to an end for that reason.

1. HA 1996, s 189A(4)–(6), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 15.62–15.86.

9.142 If, once the HA 1996, s 195(2) prevention or HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duties have ended, the applicant remains homeless and the local housing authority notifies him or her that it owes an accommodation duty, then the local housing authority must ensure that it performs that duty. Any accommodation duty owed cannot be postponed, or made conditional upon the applicant complying with certain requirements.

1. As amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 15.87–15.137.

2. As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 15.138–15.195.

3. Accommodation duties are only owed where the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant has a priority need. The accommodation duty owed could be: (a) the duty to secure short-term accommodation where the applicant is homeless, eligible for assistance, has a priority need and has become homeless intentionally (HA 1996, s 190(2)(a), as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(5), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018), see 16.81–16.93; (b) the main housing duty where the applicant is homeless, eligible for assistance, has a priority need and has not become homeless intentionally (HA 1996, s 193(2)), see 16.94–16.199; or (c) the duty to secure accommodation where the applicant is homeless, eligible for assistance, has a priority need, has not become homeless intentionally and has deliberately and unreasonably refused to co-operate (HA 1996, s 193C(4), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018), see 16.200–16.216.

Decisions pending the outcome of an application 9.144

Local housing authorities in Wales

9.143 For local housing authorities in Wales, in general, once the outcome of the assessment has been notified, then, as with local housing authorities in England, the decision as to what duty is owed cannot be changed. However, the assessment will be reviewed once the duties owed under H(W)A 2014, s 66(1) or s 73(1) have been performed. In addition, H(W)A 2014, s 79, permits a local housing authority to decide that any duty owed to the applicant has come to an end if:

- the local housing authority is no longer satisfied that the applicant is eligible for help;
- the local housing authority is satisfied that a mistake of fact led to the applicant being notified that a duty was owed;
- the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant has withdrawn his or her application; or
- the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant is unreasonably failing to cooperate with it in connection with its performance of any of the functions in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

DECISIONS PENDING THE OUTCOME OF AN APPLICATION

9.144 Not every decision made by a local housing authority in the course of dealing with an application must be notified to the applicant in writing, let alone with reasons given. In the course of dealing with an application for homelessness assistance, the local housing authority may well take a number of decisions of importance to the applicant. For example:

1. whether to accept an application for homelessness assistance;
2. whether to provide interim accommodation pending a decision on the application;
3. what interim accommodation to provide;
4. for local housing authorities in England, whether to withdraw the interim accommodation, perhaps because the applicant has rejected it;
5. whether to conduct an interview in the course of inquiries;
6. which matters to inquire into;
7. whether to explore local connection issues;
8. and many more.

1 In R (May) v Birmingham City Council [2012] EWHC 1399 (Admin), (2012) July Legal Action, p 41, the local housing authority initially notified the prospective applicant that she had the right to request a review of its decision not to accept a repeat application for homelessness assistance. This was clearly wrong and the prospective applicant successfully challenged the local housing authority through judicial review, rather than through an appeal to the county court. For 'repeat applications', see 8.80–8.82 and 8.85–8.91. For 'judicial review', see 19.306–19.333. For 'appeal to the county court', see 19.214–19.276. Even though H(W)A 2014, s 62(2) contains a statutory test allowing local housing authority in Wales to...
9.144 Inquiries and Decisions

refuse to carry out an assessment of a person’s case if the application is a repeat application, there is no duty in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, requiring the local housing authority to notify the applicant in writing of its decision.

2 HA 1996, s 188(1); H(W)A 2014, s 68(1).

3 For local housing authorities in Wales, H(W)A 2014, s 69(1) provides that an applicant must be notified, in accordance with H(W)A 2014, s 84(1), of any decision that the interim duty to secure accommodation has come to an end. The applicant has the right to request a review of the decision: H(W)A 2014, s 85(1)(c).

9.145 None of these decisions need be put in writing by the local housing authority. None of them give rise to an opportunity for a statutory review. If a local housing authority is asked for a written notification and/or reasons for one of these decisions, it may provide them. On any challenge to the relevant decision (in proceedings brought by judicial review) it would be helpful to the local housing authority to be able to point to a contemporaneous written explanation to the applicant as to why it had reached the decision under challenge.

1 See Complaint against Newham London Borough Council, 11 000 383, 8 March 2012 (2012) May Legal Action, p 34, where the Local Government Ombudsman found maladministration and stated: ‘[i]t is good practice to record reasons for a refusal to provide interim accommodation’ (para 50).

Reviews of assessments

Local housing authorities in England

9.146 Local housing authorities in England are under a duty to make an assessment of an applicant’s case if the applicant is eligible for assistance and is either threatened with homelessness or is homeless. The contents of that assessment will inform the local housing authority as to what steps it should take in order to perform the duty it owes to the applicant and help the applicant prevent his or her homelessness, or secure new accommodation.

1 HA 1996, s 189A(1), inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.62–15.86.

9.147 After the assessment has been made, the local housing authority must try to agree with the applicant the steps that he or she is required to take for the purposes of securing accommodation. Those steps must be recorded in writing and the applicant’s agreement or refusal must also be recorded.

1 HA 1996, s 189A(4)–(6), inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.72–15.80.

9.148 The local housing authority is required to keep under review:

- its assessment of the applicant’s case; and
- the appropriateness of the agreement and of the steps that both the applicant and the local housing authority have agreed to take; or
- where there has been no agreement, the steps which the local housing authority has recorded would be reasonable for the applicant to take, and the steps that the local housing authority are to take.
The English Code also advises that the local housing authority should arrange to review the assessment and the personalised housing plan if it believes that the applicant is not co-operating.

9.149 The duty to keep these matters under review continues until the local housing authority considers that it no longer owes the applicant any duty under HA 1996, Pt 7, as amended by HRA 2017. It follows that the assessment should remain in place and under review throughout the time when the applicant is being helped and/or accommodated by the local housing authority under HA 1996, Pt 7 duties.

9.150 If the local housing authority’s assessment of the three issues that it is required to consider changes, then it must notify the applicant in writing of how that assessment has changed. If the local housing authority’s assessment of other aspects of the applicant’s case changes, the local housing authority must notify the applicant in writing of those changes only if it considers it appropriate to do so.

Local housing authorities in Wales

9.151 A local housing authority in Wales must keep its assessment under review throughout the period when it considers that it owes the applicant any duty under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, or before it has decided that a duty is owed but where it considers that it may owe the applicant a duty. ‘Review’ in this context does not mean a formal review of a decision, but a reconsideration. It follows that an assessment of an applicant’s case by a local housing authority in Wales can be constantly changed and updated to deal with changing circumstances. However, that does not entitle a local housing authority to decide that an applicant’s circumstances have changed once a duty has been accepted such that a duty is no longer owed (for example, if he or she did have a priority need and no longer has it).
9.151 Inquiries and Decisions

3 Welsh Code, paras 10.50–10.52.

9.152 A local housing authority in Wales is also required to review its assessment in two specified cases:

- Case 1: where an applicant has been notified that the duty under H(W)A 2014, s 66\(^1\) prevention duty is owed and it appears to the local housing authority that the duty has or is likely to come to an end because the applicant is homeless; and

- Case 2: where an applicant has been notified that the duty under H(W)A 2014, s 73\(^2\), relief duty is owed to him or her, and it appears to the local housing authority that the duty has or is likely to come to an end in circumstances where a duty may be owed to him or her under H(W)A 2014, s 75, main housing duty\(^3\).

1 See 17.45–17.72.
2 See 17.73–17.143.

9.153 The requirement to review the assessment arises because, when the assessment is initially undertaken, the local housing authority will have been assessing whether the applicant is eligible for help and, if so, whether he or she is homeless or threatened with homelessness. That is all the information that the local housing authority needs in order to determine whether the duties in H(WA) 2014, s 66(1) or 73(1), apply. Once those duties come to an end, the local housing authority will have to assess whether or not the applicant has a priority need and (if regard is being had to the test) whether the applicant has become homeless intentionally, so as to determine whether the duty to accommodate under H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), is owed to the applicant\(^1\). The local housing authority is required to notify the outcome of the review of the assessment to the applicant and give reasons for any issues decided against the applicant’s interests\(^2\).

1 Welsh Code, paras 10.44–10.49
2 H(W)A 2014, s 63(1).

ADDITIONAL INQUIRIES AND DECISIONS

9.154 The decision or decisions notified to the applicant are unlikely to be the only important decision that has to be made by a local housing authority, particularly where the initial decision is that the applicant is owed a duty under HA 1996, Pt 7\(^1\), or under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. Some of those decisions are required to be notified to the applicant in writing; and some are not required to be notified in writing.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

Local housing authorities in England

9.155 After a local housing authority has notified an applicant of its decision:

- as to whether or not he or she is eligible for assistance¹; and, if so
- as to whether or not a duty, if any, is owed²; and if so
- which duty,

various other issues which the local housing authority will have to consider, and come to decisions about, will arise. Some of those issues are subject to specific notification requirements under HA 1996, Pt 7³.

1 HA 1996, s 184(1)(a), see 9.20.
2 HA 1996, s 184(1)(b), see 9.21–9.22.
3 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

9.156 In respect of some other decisions, there is no specific notification requirements, but assistance can be drawn from other provisions of HA 1996, Pt 7. It is probably safe to suggest that the proper inference to be drawn from the structure of the statutory provisions on the 'right to request a review'⁴ is that, at least in respect of the decisions that are potentially subject to a right of review, the local housing authority must notify (ie put in writing) those decisions. Moreover, the structure of HA 1996, s 202¹ suggests that all reviewable decisions will have been notified in writing⁵. Although there is no express obligation to give reasons for all of the decisions which carry a right to request a review, it makes good administrative sense for reasons to be given.

3 As amended by HRA 2017, s 9, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 19.8–19.69.
4 See, in particular, HA 1996, s 202(3). See 19.86–19.89.

9.157 The other decisions that may arise during the process of an application for homelessness assistance are:

- whether the interim accommodation duty at HA 1996, s 188(1) has come to an end;
- whether the conditions for referral are made out and, if so, whether the local housing authority will refer performance of the relevant duty;
- the suitability of accommodation secured under any accommodation duty; and
- whether the relevant duty has come to an end.

We discuss these decision in the following paragraphs⁶.

9.158 Inquiries and Decisions

Decisions relating to the interim accommodation duty

9.158 The duty to secure interim accommodation can be brought to an end in the following circumstances:

- where the local housing authority has notified the applicant of its decision that it does not owe him or her a HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty, because he or she is either not eligible for assistance or is not homeless;
- where the local housing authority has notified the applicant of its decision that, upon the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty coming to an end, no accommodation duty under HA 1996, ss 190 or 193, will be owed, because he or she does not have a priority need;
- where HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty has come to an end and the local housing authority has notified the applicant of its decision as to what duty, if any, is owed to the applicant; or
- where the applicant has rejected an offer of suitable interim accommodation.

9 HA 1996, s 188(1ZB)(b), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(4), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 16.60–16.65. The various duties that could be owed to the applicant are: (a) the short-term accommodation duty owed to applicants who are homelessness, eligible for assistance, have a priority need and have become homeless intentionally: HA 1996, s 190(2); (as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(5), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) see 16.81–16.93; (b) the main housing duty at HA 1996, s 193(2), owed to applicants who are homelessness, eligible for assistance, have a priority need and have not become homeless intentionally see 16.94–16.199; or (c) the accommodation duty owed to applicants who are homelessness, eligible for assistance, have a priority need, have not become homeless intentionally and have deliberately and unreasonably refused to co-operate at HA 1996, s 193C(4) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018), see 16.200–16.216. Each of these duties depend upon the local housing authority being satisfied that the applicant has a priority need. There is an exception for applicants who have made a fresh application for homelessness assistance within two years of acceptance of a private rented sector offer made in order to bring the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty to an end: HA 1996, s 193(7AA). Those applicants do not need to have a priority need in order to be owed the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty: HA 1996, ss 188(1A) and 9.159 There is no requirement on the local housing authority specifically to notify the applicant that the interim accommodation duty has come to an end. The first, second and third circumstance each depend upon notification of the principal s 184(1) decision. It would be expected that contents of the s 184(1) decision would include information about the interim accommodation duty coming to an end. There is no right to request a review of any decision that the interim accommodation duty has come to an end, but the applicant does have a right to request a review of the HA 1996, s 184, decision that triggered the interim accommodation duty coming to an end.

1 Whether he or she is eligible for assistance, and whether a duty, and if so, what duty is owed to the applicant.

9.160 In relation to the fourth circumstance, there are no notification requirements specified in HA 1996, Pt 7. However, it would be expected that the local housing authority would inform the applicant that his or her refusal of the interim accommodation offered means that no further interim accommodation would be secured under HA 1996, s 188(1). If the applicant wishes to dispute that decision, whether in relation to the suitability of the accommodation secured or on any other issues, his or her remedy would be a claim in judicial review, arguing that the local housing authority has made an error of law.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, s 5(8), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

Decisions relating to the conditions for referral

9.161 A local housing authority must notify the applicant of the following decisions:

- that it considers that the conditions are met for referral of the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty to another local housing authority and intends to notify or has notified the other local housing authority of that opinion;
- that it has been decided, by agreement between the two local housing authorities or following a referee's decision, that the conditions for referral of the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty are met;
- that it has been decided that the conditions for referral of the HA 1996, s 189B(2), relief duty are not met;
- that it considers that the conditions are met for referral of the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty to another local housing authority and intends to notify or has notified the other local housing authority of that opinion; and

9.161 Inquiries and Decisions

- that it has been decided, by agreement between the two local housing authorities or following a referee’s decision, that the conditions for referral of the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty are met; and
- that it has been decided that the conditions for referral of the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty are not met.

9.162 HA 1996, Pt 7, provides that all but the fourth of those notifications must contain reasons for the local housing authority's decision. In addition, the applicant has the right to request a review of all but the first decision. Notifications of the second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth decision must therefore inform the applicant of his or her right to request a review and of the time within the request must be made.

DECISIONS AS TO THE SUITABILITY OF ACCOMMODATION

9.163 The decision as to suitability of accommodation offered under any of the duties or powers in HA 1996, Pt 7, is not specifically required to be notified in writing, nor is it the subject of any obligation to give reasons. Nor, indeed, is there any express obligation on the local housing authority to make inquiries into the issue of suitability (although, because it is a public authority, it must have regard to all relevant considerations and otherwise comply with the ordinary principles of administrative law). The Court of Appeal has held that there is no obligation on a local housing authority to give reasons for its decision that an offer of accommodation is suitable in the offer letter.

1 As amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

9.164 The issue of suitability arises not only in relation to any letter offering accommodation, but also in relation to any decision by a local housing authority that its duty has come to an end, because the applicant has refused an offer of suitable accommodation. That decision should normally be notified in writing, because there is a right to request a review of that decision, but there is no obligation to give reasons in the decision letter for the local housing authority’s decision that the accommodation offered was suitable.

1 HA 1996, s 202(1)(b) as amended by HRA 2017, s 9, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 19.15–19.17, Warsang v Homewood London Borough Council [2000] 32 HLR 335, CA.

9.165 However, where the issue of suitability relates to anything other than HA 1996, s 188 interim accommodation, the applicant has a right to request a review of the local housing authority’s assessment of suitability. Any decision made on review, if decided against the interests of the applicant, must contain reasons for that decision.

1 HA 1996, s 202(1)(f), (g) and (h), as amended by HRA 2017, s 9, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 19.59–19.69.

DECISIONS NOTIFYING THAT THE DUTY HAS COME TO AN END

9.166 The local housing authority must notify the applicant, in writing, of any decision that certain duties have come to an end. The notification must also specify the circumstances that have led to the decision, the applicant’s right to request a review of the decision and the time limit in which to do so. Those decisions are:
9.166 Inquiries and Decisions

- any decision that the HA 1996, s 195(2)\(^2\), prevention duty has come to an end by reason of the one of the circumstances at HA 1996, s 195(8) or (10)\(^3\);
- any decision that the HA 1996, s 189B(2)\(^4\), relief duty has come to an end by reason of the one of the circumstances at HA 1996, s 189B(7) or (9)\(^5\);
- any decision that the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty\(^6\) has come to an end by reason of one of the events at HA 1996, s 193(5)–(7AA)\(^7\); and
- any decision that the HA 1996, s 193C(4)\(^8\), accommodation duty has come to an end by reason of one of the events at HA 1996, s 193C(5)–(6)\(^9\).

\(^1\) HA 1996, ss 189B(6) and 195(7), as inserted and amended by HRA 2017, ss 4(2) and 5(2), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

\(^6\) See 16.94–16.199.
\(^7\) See 16.113–16.179.

\(^9\) As inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, see 16.204–16.216.

9.167 Several of those circumstances are as a result of the applicant having refused an offer of suitable accommodation. Most, but not all, offers must include information about the possible consequences of refusal or acceptance of the offer, and of the applicant’s right to request a review of the suitability of the accommodation. Those offers are:

- a final accommodation offer\(^1\) made in order to bring the HA 1996, s 189B(2)\(^2\), relief duty to an end\(^3\);
- a final Pt 6 offer\(^4\) made in order to bring the HA 1996, s 189B(2)\(^5\), relief duty to an end\(^6\);
- an offer of accommodation made under the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty\(^7\);
- a final offer of Pt 6 accommodation made in order to bring the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty to an end\(^8\);
- a private rented sector offer made in order to bring the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty to an end\(^9\);
- a final accommodation offer\(^10\) made in order to bring the HA 1996, s 193C(4)\(^11\), accommodation duty to an end\(^12\); and

Local housing authorities in Wales

9.168 H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, contains a rigorous structure for notification of decisions after the H(W)A 2014, s 62 assessment has been notified to the applicant. These include:

1. a decision to refer an application to another local housing authority under the local connection provisions (because the local housing authority making the referral has assessed the applicant as having a priority need and as not having become homeless intentionally and believes that the conditions for referral may be met);
2. a decision that the conditions for referral of an application to another local housing authority are actually met; and
3. a decision that any of the local housing authority’s duties to help to prevent homelessness, to help to secure accommodation, to secure accommodation for applicants who have a priority need, or the interim duty to secure accommodation for homeless applicants who may have a priority need, have come to an end.
9.168 Inquiries and Decisions

All of these decisions must be notified in writing, with reasons, and inform the applicant of his or her right to request a review and of the time within which such a request must be made.

9.169 A decision that the local housing authority’s duty to secure or help to secure accommodation has come to an end might be for one of various different reasons:

(1) each duty contains a list of circumstances where the duty will come to an end; or

(2) as a result of any of the circumstances specified in H(W)A 2014, s 79.

1 The circumstances in which the duty in H(W)A 2014, s 66(1), comes to an end are set out in H(W)A 2014, s 67, see 17.56–17.72; the circumstances in which the duty in H(W)A 2014, s 68, comes to an end are set out in H(W)A 2014, s 69, see 17.128–17.133; the circumstances in which the duty in H(W)A 2014, s 73(1), comes to an end are set out in H(W)A 2014, s 74, see 17.84–17.117; the circumstances in which the duty in H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), comes to an end are set out in H(W)A 2014, s 76, see 17.158–17.188.

2 H(W)A 2014, s 79, see 17.189–17.197.

9.170 The circumstances specified in H(W)A 2014, s 79, are where the local housing authority has notified the applicant of any of the following:

• that it is no longer satisfied that the applicant is eligible for help;

• that it is satisfied that a mistake of fact had led to the applicant being notified under H(W)A 2014, s 63(1), that a duty was owed to him or her;

• that it is satisfied that the applicant has withdrawn his or her application; or

• that it is satisfied that the applicant is unreasonably failing to cooperate with the local housing authority in connection with the exercise of any of the local housing authority’s functions under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 79(2); Welsh Code, paras 15.79; see 17.192.

2 H(W)A 2014, s 79(3); Welsh Code, paras 15.80–15.83; see 17.193.

3 H(W)A 2014, s 79(4); Welsh Code, paras 15.84–15.85; see 17.194.

4 H(W)A 2014, s 79(5); Welsh Code, paras 15.86–15.89; see 17.195–17.197.

9.171 Where a local housing authority in Wales is satisfied that its duty has come to an end, it must notify the applicant in writing that it no longer regards itself as being subject to the relevant duty, of the reasons why, of the right to request a review and of the time within which the request must be made. Where the decision is that the duty under H(W)A 2014, s 73(1) has come to an end at the end of the 56-day period, or has come to an end because the local housing authority is satisfied that reasonable steps have been taken to secure that suitable accommodation is available for occupation by the applicant, the notification must include notice of the steps taken by the local housing authority to help to secure that suitable accommodation would be available for occupation by the applicant. The applicant has the right to request a review of any decision that the duties have ended and, if relevant, of whether or not reasonable steps were taken during the period when the H(W)A 2014, s 73(1) duty was owed.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 84(1); Welsh Code, paras 15.93–15.98.
2 H(W)A 2014, s 74(2).
3 H(W)A 2014, s 74(3); Welsh Code, paras 15.53–15.54. The Code advises that local housing authorities should be ‘cautious’ when using this mechanism to bring the duty to an end.
4 H(W)A 2014, s 84(2).
5 H(W)A 2014, s 85(1)(c) and (2).

9.172 The decision must be notified to the applicant in writing. Where a notice is not received by an applicant, he or she may be treated as having been notified if the notice was made available at the local housing authority’s office for a reasonable period for collection by the applicant or by someone on his or her behalf.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 84(3); Welsh Code, paras 15.93–15.98.
2 H(W)A 2014, s 84(4).

9.173 A local housing authority in Wales may not decide that its duty has come to an end as a result of an applicant refusing an offer of accommodation unless the local housing authority is satisfied that the applicant had been notified in writing of the possible consequences of refusal or acceptance of the offer before he or she refused the offer.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 67(4)(a), see 17.66–17.72, s 69(7), see 17.129, and 17.172; s 74(5), see 17.109–17.119; and s 76(3), see 17.165–17.177.

Decisions not required to be notified in writing

9.174 This still leaves a large number of decisions which will be made by a local housing authority in England or in Wales in the course of its dealings with an applicant which are not the subject of any express requirement:

(1) to make inquiries;
(2) to notify the decision in writing; or
(3) to give reasons.

9.175 Those are the decisions in relation to which there is no explicit statutory requirement under HA 1996, s 184, H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, or elsewhere, and no right to a statutory review. Accordingly, these decisions are subject only to the normal constraints of good administration and administrative law. An applicant aggrieved by any such decision could use the complaints procedure, complain to the relevant Ombudsman and/or bring proceedings for judicial review.

INTRODUCTION

10.1 The main statutory duties set out in Pt 7 of the Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996) as amended by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017) and Pt 2 of the Housing (Wales) Act 2014 (H(W)A 2014) are owed only to those whom a local housing authority is satisfied are either ‘homeless’ or ‘threatened with homelessness’. Each of those terms is very tightly defined by HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, so that there is no room for alternative terminology, such as ‘rooflessness’, or for more colloquial approaches such as whether someone has ‘a place to sleep’ or ‘a home of their own’. As this chapter demonstrates, the tightness of the legal definitions can produce some surprising results: even the owner of a mansion could, in certain circumstances, be ‘homeless’ for the purposes of HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

2 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

DEFINITION OF ‘HOMELESS’

Overview

10.2 The legal definition of ‘homeless’ is contained in four inter-related sections of HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. Taken together, these sections provide that a person is homeless if he or she:
10.2 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

(1) has no accommodation physically available for him or her to occupy in the UK or elsewhere; or
(2) has no accommodation available which he or she is legally entitled to occupy; or
(3) has accommodation which is available and which he or she is entitled to occupy, but cannot secure entry to that accommodation; or
(4) has accommodation available, which he or she is entitled to occupy, but that accommodation consists of a moveable structure and there is no place where the applicant is entitled or permitted both to place and reside in it; or
(5) has accommodation available, which he or she is entitled to occupy and entry can be secured to it, but that accommodation is not reasonable to continue to occupy.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 Housing Act 1996, ss 175–178 as amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; Housing (Wales) Act 2014, ss 55–58.

4 HA 1996, s 175(1)(a)–(c); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1)(a)–(c).

5 HA 1996, s 175(2)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 55(2)(a).

7 HA 1996, s 173(3); H(W)A 2014, s 55(3).

10.3 In practice, the easiest way to apply the statutory definition is to start from the presumption that everyone is homeless. Then to ask whether, on the facts, all of the following conditions are satisfied:

(1) there is ‘accommodation’; and
(2) it is ‘available’ for the applicant’s occupation; and
(3) the applicant has some right to occupy it; and
(4) the applicant can physically enter it; and
(5) it would be reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy it.

2 See 10.17–10.32.

3 See 10.33–10.65.

4 See 10.73–10.134.

5 See 11.73–11.129.

10.4 Only if all of those conditions are fulfilled can the applicant be said not to be ‘homeless’. There is an extra condition which must be satisfied if the relevant accommodation is ‘a moveable structure’.

1 Discussed at 10.68–10.72.

10.5 The question for the local housing authority is whether the applicant is homeless at the date of the making of the decision on his or her application. If an applicant for homelessness assistance has obtained accommodation, meeting the conditions described either at HA 1996, ss 175–178 or (as appropriate) at H(W)A 2014, ss 55–58, after he or she has made the application, but before the making of the decision on that application, he or she will no longer be homeless.

2 Hanton-Rhouila v Westminster City Council [2010] EWCA Civ 1334, [2011] HLR 12, CA. Unless the accommodation is being provided by the local housing authority itself in performance of its housing duties; see 10.13.

10.6 There is a special deeming provision for applicants who are re-applying for homelessness assistance within two years of acceptance of a private rented sector offer¹. Applicants in those circumstances who have been served with a valid Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice are to be treated as homeless from the date on which the notice expires². There is no equivalent deeming provision in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, for applicants in Wales.

¹ ‘Private rented sector offers’ are defined at HA 1996 s 193(7AC). See 16.153–16.179. See further 8.100–8.107 in relation to applications for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in performance of two years of acceptance of the private rented sector.
² HA 1996, s 195A(2) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(4), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 10.116.

10.7 In the following paragraphs each of the conditions which form the component parts of the statutory definition of ‘homeless’ are examined in turn.

The meaning of ‘accommodation’

10.8 The question is not ‘does the applicant have an “address”?’ or ‘does he or she have somewhere to stay?’ but rather ‘does the applicant have “accommodation”?’

10.9 HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 give no definition of this term. The standard dictionary definitions refer to ‘lodgings’ or ‘living quarters’. In practice, ordinary English usage tends to refer to ‘accommodation’ as shelter with a degree of permanence.

¹ As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
² For example, in the Chambers Dictionary (revised 13th edn).

10.10 It is for the local housing authority to decide whether what it is considering constitutes ‘accommodation’. Houses or flats (or parts of them) are not the only units that the local housing authority can regard as falling within the meaning of ‘accommodation’. In R v Hillingdon London Borough Council ex p Puhlhofer¹, the courts upheld a local housing authority’s decision that a modest hotel room in a bed and breakfast guest house occupied by a husband and wife and their two children (later described as a ‘single cramped and squalid bedroom’)² was ‘accommodation’.

10.11 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

10.11 This does not mean that anything pressed into service for sleeping in can constitute ‘accommodation’. Examples not constituting ‘accommodation’ canvassed in the case law include ‘Diogenes’ barrel’¹ and ‘a potting shed’². It would be hard to describe a cardboard box in a shop doorway, a factory where a homeless worker was allowed to sleep overnight, or a car used to sleep in as ‘accommodation’. Even though a prison cell is physically capable of accommodating a prisoner, it cannot be treated as ‘accommodation’ for the purposes of the definition of ‘homeless’³.

² R v Hillingdon London Borough Council ex p Puhlhofer [1986] AC 484, HL per Ackner LJ (giving judgment in the Court of Appeal) at 491.

³ Stewart v London Borough of Lambeth [2002] EWCA Civ 753, [2002] HLR 40, CA and R (B) v Southwark London Borough Council [2003] EWHC 1678 (Admin), (2004) 36 HLR 3, Admin Ct. In Rageb v Kensington and Chelsea Royal Borough Council [2017] EWCA Civ 360, CA, the Court of Appeal refused permission to appeal to an applicant who sought to argue that this principle should be extended to property which he was required to occupy by the terms of his licence, following his release from prison.

10.12 From 1982 until 2008, the approach of the courts was that crisis accommodation should not fall within the definition of ‘accommodation’ for these purposes. This approach was based on a 1982 decision that women’s refuges did not fall within the definition. The approach was reviewed, and held to be wrong, by the Court of Appeal in 2008 in Moran v Manchester City Council, Richards v Ipswich Borough Council⁴. The House of Lords subsequently considered an appeal in that case and decided that women’s refuges were not reasonable for women to continue to occupy indefinitely. As a result, the House of Lords held that there was no need to consider, in reaching its own decision in that case, whether other refuges and hostels, or other forms of shelter such as prison cells or hospital wards, were ‘accommodation’ or not⁵. The question of whether other forms of crisis accommodation should fall within the definition of ‘accommodation’ remains open⁶.

⁴ In Horwitz v Bath and North East Somerset Council [2013] EWCA Civ 839, (2015) September Legal Action, p 30, CA, the Court of Appeal granted the applicant permission to bring a second appeal against a decision that accommodation provided on an emergency basis at a nursing home is ‘accommodation’ for the purposes of the statutory definition. It appears that the appeal never proceeded.

10.13 For policy reasons, accommodation provided by a local housing authority under the interim duty to accommodate¹, or under its powers to provide accommodation pending review² or pending appeal³, is not ‘accommodation’ for the purposes of the statutory definition. An applicant is still homeless even if occupying such interim accommodation⁴.

4 R (Alam) v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council [2009] EWHC 44, (2009) March Legal Action, p 24. In Ali & others v Birmingham City Council, Moran v Manchester City Council [2009] UKHL 36, [2009] 1 WLR 1506, HL, Manchester City Council accepted that an applicant remained homeless while occupying interim accommodation provided under HA 1996, s 188(1); see Baroness Hale at [55]. In O’Callaghan v Southwark London Borough Council (2010) May Legal Action, p 23, Lambeth County Court, an applicant who was occupying interim accommodation secured under the local housing authority’s duty at HA 1996, s 188(1) could not have become homeless intentionally when she subsequently lost the accommodation, because she had remained ‘homeless’ throughout the period of occupation of the accommodation.

10.14 But some circumstances can generate real issues as to whether the subject matter is ‘accommodation’. For example, is a tent or a beach hut, which a family has been forced to occupy for several weeks, ‘accommodation’?

10.15 These issues on the meaning of ‘accommodation’ are brought into sharper focus by the globalisation of the definition of homelessness. Until 1996 the question was whether the applicant had ‘accommodation’ in England, Scotland or Wales. Now the question is whether the applicant has ‘accommodation’ in the United Kingdom (bringing Northern Ireland within scope)¹ or ‘elsewhere’, ie anywhere in the world. As a result, the question ‘Is it “accommodation”?’ must now be applied to a wider range of forms of habitation.

1 See 11.28 and Box 1.
2 HA 1996, s 175(1); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1).

10.16 If the local housing authority has decided that the applicant has ‘accommodation’, the next inquiry is whether it is ‘available for his occupation’¹.

1 HA 1996, s 175(1); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1).

The meaning of ‘available for occupation’

10.17 The local housing authority must consider first whether the accommodation is factually ‘available’. If so, the second consideration is whether the accommodation is ‘available for’ the applicant’s occupation and for the occupation of all members of the applicant’s household as defined by HA 1996, s 176 and H(W)A 2014, s 56.

The factual test

10.18 The factual question is the most straightforward: is the particular accommodation ‘available’ to the applicant as a matter of fact? Accommodation which is hypothetically or notionally available will not suffice: the language of HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, which use the present tense, ‘is not apt to refer to unspecified accommodation which may in the future become available’. HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, specifically deal with situations where admission to the accommodation is physically barred so that the applicant cannot secure entry to it. But factual ‘availability’ can embrace broader issues, especially given that the accommodation under consideration might be anywhere in the world. In Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council, the accommodation being considered was a room in the applicant’s father-in-law’s house in Bangladesh. The court was satisfied that if the applicant had said to the local housing authority that she could not get to Bangladesh (eg because of her lack of means) or could not enter that country (eg because of her immigration status) the local housing authority would have had to decide whether the accommodation was in fact ‘available’ to her:
10.18 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

‘To hold that it is available to her because it is legally and physically hers to occupy, without regard to the question of whether she has any way of getting there, is not only to take leave of reality; it is to drain the word “available” of any meaning.’

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 Johnston v Westminster City Council [2015] EWCA Civ 554, [2015] PTSR 1557, CA per Gloster LJ at [27]. In that case Westminster found that the applicant was not homeless, as he was owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty by another local housing authority. The Court of Appeal held that this was wrong in law since no accommodation had actually been made available at the time of the decision.
3 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
4 HA 1996, s 175(2)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 55(2)(a); see 10.66–10.72.
5 Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council (2000) 32 HLR 445, CA at 464 per Sedley LJ. It should be noted that the majority of the Court of Appeal in Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council said that the issue of whether or not accommodation was reasonable for an applicant to occupy was not relevant where the applicant was not actually occupying the accommodation. That has now been held to be wrong by the Court of Appeal in Maloba v Waltham Forest London Borough Council [2007] EWCA Civ 1281, , [2008] 2 All ER 701, [2008] HLR 408, CA. See 10.74.

10.19 So, if there is accommodation that the applicant has the right to occupy, but it is not in fact ‘available’, the applicant is homeless. Those granted refugee status in the UK because they cannot return to their countries of origin may have perfectly good homes in those countries but would be ‘homeless’ here because their accommodation is not ‘available’. Likewise, the issue of whether accommodation is ‘available’ is raised where:

1) a person leaves his or her home in search of work, travels to the other end of the country and expends all his or her resources looking for work, leaving him or her unable to return home;

2) a person is the subject of a banning order under anti-terrorism legislation preventing him or her from returning to a country (or a part of this country) in which his or her home is situated; or

3) a person is prohibited by a court order (such as an injunction or closure order) from entering the premises or geographic area in which his or her home is situated\textsuperscript{1}.

\textsuperscript{1} Some of these examples were cited in \textit{Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council} (2000) 32 HLR 445, CA at 464 per Sedley LJ.

\textbf{10.20} In each of these cases, although the applicant would have accommodation which he or she is legally entitled to occupy, the accommodation would not be ‘available’ for his or her occupation.

\textit{The special statutory definition}

\textbf{10.21} If there is accommodation factually available to the applicant, the next question is whether the special statutory definition of ‘available’ is met\textsuperscript{1}. Accommodation only counts as available if it is available for occupation not only by the applicant but also by those people who normally reside with the applicant as members of his or her family and also by any other person who might reasonably be expected to reside with the applicant\textsuperscript{2}.

\textsuperscript{1} HA 1996, s 176; H(W)A 2014, s 56.
\textsuperscript{2} HA 1996, s 176; H(W)A 2014, s 56.

\textbf{10.22} In effect, this means that accommodation will only be considered available if it is available to occupy by both the applicant and all of the other members of his or her household. The purpose of the provision is clear: a person is to be considered homeless \textit{unless} there is accommodation sufficient in its factual and legal capacity to accommodate the applicant’s entire household. So the local housing authority first needs to establish the extent of the relevant household and then consider whether there is accommodation available for all those persons to occupy together\textsuperscript{1}.

\textsuperscript{1} Where a household has to live in separate units of accommodation, the accommodation will be available for occupation by the applicant and all members of his or her household (as defined by HA 1996, s 176 and H(W)A 2014, s 56) if and only if the units are ‘so located that they enable the family to live “together” in practical terms’. \textit{Sharif v Camden London Borough Council} [2013] UKSC 10, [2013] HLR 16, SC per Lord Carnwath at [17]. In that case the family of three, who were accommodated in two separate units on the same floor of a hostel, were deemed to be accommodated ‘together’ for the purposes of HA 1996, s 176. See 18.10–18.11.

\textbf{Members of the applicant’s household}

\textbf{10.23} Two different groups of people could fall within the applicant’s household for these purposes:

(1) \textit{Group One} – those who normally reside with the applicant as a member of the applicant’s family\textsuperscript{1}.

(2) \textit{Group Two} – any other persons who might reasonably be expected to reside with the applicant\textsuperscript{2}.

\textsuperscript{1} HA 1996, s 176(a); H(W)A 2014, s 56(1)(a).
\textsuperscript{2} HA 1996, s 176(b); H(W)A 2014, s 56(1)(b).
10.24 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

Group One: ‘normally resides with him as a member of his family’

10.24 To fall within Group One a person must fulfil two conditions¹:

- he or she must normally reside with the applicant; and
- must do so as a member of the applicant’s family.

10.25 There is no additional condition that it must be ‘reasonable’ for that person to reside with the applicant. The local housing authority may or may not think it reasonable for the applicant to be normally residing, as part of one family unit, with a host of relatives, in-laws, or even friends and others. But the local housing authority’s opinion is irrelevant. The conditions raise simple factual questions for decision – who is living with the applicant and why – not issues of judgment.

¹ Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities (Ministry of Housing, Communities and Local Government, February 2018) (the English Code), para 6.7, at Appendix 2 of this book; Code of Guidance for Local Authorities on the Allocation of Accommodation and Homelessness (Welsh Government, March 2016) (the Welsh Code), para 8.7 on the CD Rom with this book. See further R v Newham London Borough Council ex p Khan and Hussain (2001) 33 HLR 269, QBD, where the local housing authority’s decision that two adult sisters, who both occupied accommodation together along with their husbands and children, did not normally reside together was held to be irrational.

10.26 To fall within the first condition, it is necessary that the person concerned ‘resides with’ the applicant. Someone who is simply a regular visitor to the applicant’s home will not fall within the definition². A very short period of temporary residence with the applicant is also unlikely to suffice, because the person must ‘normally’ reside with the applicant. Finally, there is no requirement that the person who normally lives with the applicant is literally doing so at the time of the application for homelessness assistance. Children will still ‘normally reside’ with their mother even if she fled the family home in fear of domestic violence a few days earlier. An elderly person unable to return from hospital to his or her normal home will ‘normally reside with’ those with whom he or she was living before going into hospital.

² See further discussion of ‘resides with’ at 12.54–12.57.

10.27 The second condition is that the person normally resides with the applicant ‘as a member of his [or her] family’. This term is not defined in HA 1996, Pt 7³ or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. Indeed, a definition of ‘family’ would not help, as the test is whether the person lived with the applicant ‘as’ a member of the applicant’s family. The question is not whether the other person is a member of the applicant’s family.

³ HA 1996, s 176(a); H(W)A 2014, s 56(1)(a).

10.28 Limited help is to be found in the Codes of Guidance, which advise that ‘[t]he phrase “as a member of his [or her] family” will include those with close blood or marital relationships and cohabiting partners (including same sex partners).¹¹

Group Two: ‘any other person who might reasonably be expected to reside with him’

10.29 The second group who may qualify for these purposes as members of the applicant’s household (Group Two) contains three potential sub-groups. These comprise¹:

(1) any member of the applicant’s family not normally residing with him or her, but who might reasonably be expected to reside with the applicant.
   For example, a dependent child who has been living with his or her mother but who is, by arrangement between the separated parents, to begin living with his or her father (the applicant) will fall within this category². As the Codes helpfully emphasise, the question of who the child is to reside with is nowadays more likely to be dealt with by parental agreement than by court order³. Another example might be a married couple, or civil partners, who have to live apart, with their respective parents, because they have nowhere they can live together⁴. It must be remembered that one purpose of HA 1996, Pt 7 and of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 is ‘bringing families together’⁵.

(2) someone already normally residing with the applicant (but not as a member of his or her family) who might reasonably be expected to continue to reside with the applicant.
   This might be a lodger, nanny, carer, friend of the family or anyone else who has been living with the applicant but not ‘as’ a family member. Obviously the fact that the person is already actually residing with the applicant will be a powerful factor when the local housing authority decides whether it is reasonable for him or her to continue to live with the applicant.

(3) someone who is not a member of the applicant’s family and does not normally live with the applicant but who might reasonably be expected to reside with the applicant.
   This sub-group will embrace those who wish to live with the applicant but do not currently do so. The classic example is the prospective carer⁶ who wishes to live with and look after the applicant. But the classic example can sometimes cause a local housing authority to believe that the relevant question is whether the applicant needs a companion or carer. That is not the correct approach⁷. The question is simple: ‘Is it reasonable to expect this person to reside with the applicant?’

¹¹ HA 1996, s 176(b); H(W)A 2014, s 56(1)(b).
² For further examples where the person is a dependent child, see 12.58–12.75.

7 R v Hackney London Borough Council ex p Tonnicodi (1998) 30 HLR 916, QBD.

10.30 The Codes give two further examples of those who will fall within the second group of household members (Group Two):

- foster children;
- companions for elderly or disabled applicants.

The Codes advise that those people might reasonably be expected to reside with an applicant.\(^1\)

\(^1\) Although the correct approach in the authors’ view should be that current foster children would fall within Group One, and prospective foster children within Group Two.

Application of the special statutory definition

10.31 Once the local housing authority has identified the total number of people forming the applicant’s household (ie the composite of Groups One and Two), it can return to the central task of determining whether the applicant is ‘homeless’. The relevant question posed by HA 1996, Pt 7, and by H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 is then whether the accommodation under consideration is available not just for occupation by the applicant but also for occupation by all the members of the applicant’s household.\(^2\)

\(^1\) As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

\(^2\) HA 1996, s 176; H(W)A 2014, s 56.

10.32 This is essentially a factual issue about practical and legal availability. If the only accommodation available to a male applicant is a shared room with four other men in a men-only hostel, he will be homeless if his household now includes a female (for example, a woman he has just married or a wife with whom he has been reunited)\(^1\) and he does not have other accommodation into which he can move. Likewise, if a husband and wife have a home together, but the husband is prevented from returning to it by some legal restriction (such as a court order obtained by a third party) the wife will be ‘homeless’ on her application to the local housing authority, because her home is no longer available to a member of her family with whom she normally resides.

\(^1\) As was the case in R v Hillingdon London Borough Council ex p Islam [1983] 1 AC 688, HL.

The meaning of ‘entitled to occupy’

10.33 Assuming that the local housing authority is satisfied that there is accommodation\(^1\) available to the applicant and his or her household, the next question is whether the applicant has some sort of right or legal entitlement to occupy the accommodation.\(^2\)

\(^1\) See 10.8–10.16.

\(^2\) See 10.17–10.32.
10.34 An applicant will have a relevant entitlement to occupy accommodation only if he or she has the right to occupy it by reason of one of the following:

- a legal interest in it; or
- the benefit of an order of a court that he or she is entitled to occupy it; or
- an express or implied licence to occupy it; or
- some legal protection preventing the applicant from being evicted from it.

1 HA 1996, s 175(1)(a), H(W)A 2014, s 55(1)(a).
2 HA 1996, s 175(1)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1)(a).
3 HA 1996, s 175(1)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1)(b).
4 HA 1996, s 175(1)(c); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1)(c).

10.35 If an applicant rids himself or herself of the right to occupy his or her only available accommodation (eg by selling owned property or by assigning or ending a lease or tenancy), then he or she will be homeless but is likely to be found to have become homeless intentionally.

10.36 Each of the relevant forms of right to occupy requires close consideration.

‘... an interest in it’

10.37 This first alternative is satisfied if the applicant has a legal interest in the accommodation. That might be freehold or leasehold ownership or a tenancy. Unless the applicant enjoys some other right to occupy the accommodation, he or she will become homeless when the legal interest is brought to an end. For example, a joint tenant’s legal interest will end on the expiry of a notice to quit given by the other joint tenant.

1 HA 1996, s 175(1)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1)(a).

10.38 However, a legal interest only counts for these purposes if, by virtue of it, the applicant is entitled to occupy the accommodation. It is not sufficient for the local housing authority to establish that the applicant owns the accommodation. He or she may have let or sub-let it to others who are, as a result, the people entitled to occupy it, whereas the applicant is not. The local housing authority could not, in those circumstances, avoid finding that the applicant is homeless by advising him or her to repossess the property let out to tenants. The applicant is ‘homeless’ now.

1 Such a scenario occurred in R (Miah) v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council (2013) May Legal Action, p 36, Clerkenwell and Shoreditch County Court, where the applicant was the owner of a house let to a tenant. On her application for homelessness assistance, the local housing authority initially decided that she was not homeless because she owned the house. An appeal to the County Court against that decision was allowed on the basis that the house was not ‘available’ to her.
10.39 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

‘... an order of a court’

10.39 A person may be entitled to occupy accommodation under an order of a court, if, for example, he or she has the protection of a court order granting him or her the right to occupy in family proceedings, or (more unusually) a court has made a declaration that the person has a beneficial interest in the land carrying a right to immediate occupation.\(^1\)

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 175(1)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1)(a).

‘... express or implied licence to occupy’

10.40 A licence\(^1\) is simply permission to occupy. The person giving the permission is a licensor; the person given the permission is the licensee. An express licence arises when permission to occupy is explicitly given verbally or in writing. An implied licence exists when permission to occupy has never been expressly granted but can simply be inferred or assumed (for example, very few parents expressly say to their young children ‘you can live with me’ – such permission is to be inferred).\(^1\)

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 175(1)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1)(b).

10.41 Sometimes, the permission will have been granted in return for the payment of money or provision of services. More often, the licence will be a bare licence, the simple grant of permission to occupy without any money or services paid in return. Examples of licensees given in the Codes are lodgers, employees who have service occupancies (ie accommodation that they occupy in order to do their jobs), those living with relatives and those staying in hospital.\(^1\) Precisely because ‘licence’ simply means ‘permission’ it can be applied to accommodation anywhere in the world without the need to refer to the property laws of the relevant country.\(^1\)

\(^1\) English Code, paras 6.10(b) and 6.11; Welsh Code para 8.9(ii).

10.42 The task for the local housing authority is to identify whether the applicant ‘has’ (present tense) an express or implied licence to occupy the relevant accommodation.\(^1\) This means that a licence that an applicant did have in the past, or could get in the future, is quite irrelevant to the question of whether he or she is homeless now. Even if the local housing authority can identify accommodation that the applicant has recently occupied under a licence (which has ended), and where a further licence is being offered, the applicant will still be ‘homeless’. So, where a former live-in housekeeper, having lost her employment and the licence to occupy accommodation, had been offered re-employment and a further licence, she was still homeless at the date of her application.\(^2\) Likewise, an applicant who has a licence to occupy a night shelter for one night only is homeless during the day, even if he or she could secure another licence for another night in the same shelter.\(^3\)

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 175(1)(b); H(W)A 2014 s 55(1)(b).

\(^2\) R v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council ex p Minton (1988) 20 HLR 648, QBD.
Definition of ‘homeless’

10.45 For those licensees who are not protected by the Protection from Eviction Act 1977\(^1\), homelessness will arise immediately the licence ends, even if they do not actually move out. In such cases, the Codes correctly advise local housing authorities that if the licence has been determined, but the occupier remains in occupation as a trespasser, the occupier will be homeless\(^2\). The Codes give, as examples, the termination of licences to those who have been living with friends or relatives, in hostels or hospitals, or former employees occupying premises under a service occupancy whose contracts of employment have ended\(^3\). Each of those examples may fall outside the protection of the Protection from Eviction Act 1977\(^4\).

\(^1\) Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s 3A.
\(^2\) There are a wide range of circumstances in which it will not, such as where the licensee shares accommodation with the licensor. See R v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council ex p O’Sullivan [1991] EGCS 110, QBD and Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s 3A.

See also R v Surrey Heath Borough Council ex p Li [1984] 16 HLR 79, QBD, where the local housing authority’s advice to a former licensee asked to leave service accommodation – that he could remain in occupation until a possession order was obtained – was held to be wrong, and a decision that the applicant was not homeless was quashed.
\(^4\) Protection from Eviction Act 1977, ss 3–3A. Note, that some forms of accommodation that are not listed expressly in PEA 1977, s 3A may still fall outside of the protection of that Act, where the accommodation is not classed as a ‘dwelling’ within the meaning of PEA 1977, s 3. See R (N) v Lewisham London Borough Council [2014] UKSC 62, [2015] HLR 6, SC. Further, the position in relation to service occupiers can be complex and dependent on the terms of the contract of employment. See Hertfordshire County Council v Davies [2017] 1 WLR 4395, [2017] HLR 33, QBD.
10.46 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

10.46 The Court of Appeal has held that, where a secure tenant leaves his or her accommodation, and the landlord subsequently terminates the tenancy by service of a notice to quit, but has refrained from taking possession proceedings, the former tenant becomes a licensee during the ‘period of grace’ before proceedings are brought. This is a difficult decision to construe. If the tenant was occupying the accommodation as his or her only or principal home at the date of expiry of the notice to quit, then the notice would not have determined the tenancy and the tenant would have continued to enjoy security of tenure. If, on the other hand, the tenant had not been occupying his or her accommodation at that date, then he or she was not a residential occupier and was not entitled to the protection offered by the Protection from Eviction Act 1977. In effect, this former tenant was being offered a chance to return to the accommodation, even though the previous tenancy had been terminated. It is hard to see how that chance can be construed as a licence.

2 Housing Act 1985, ss 81–82 for secure tenancies; Housing Act 1988, ss 1 and 5 for assured tenancies.

3 As was the case in Porteous v West Dorset District Council [2004] EWCA Civ 244, [2004] HLR 30, CA.

10.47 Various Local Government Ombudsman investigations have found maladministration where applicants who did not enjoy protection under the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 were wrongly told that they were not homeless until possession orders were obtained against them.

1 See for example Complaint against Ealing London Borough Council, 90/A/1038, where the local housing authority was invited to repay to the complainants the legal costs that they had been ordered to pay to their resident landlord by the court in the possession proceedings, having been wrongly told by the local housing authority that they should await a court order.

10.48 One of the most common causes of homelessness is the termination of a licence to occupy the home of a friend or relative with whom the applicant has been staying. Many such applicants apply to local housing authorities reporting simply that they have been ‘asked to leave’. Quite properly, the Codes recommend that where someone reports being asked to leave accommodation by family or friends the local housing authority ‘will need to consider carefully whether the applicant’s licence to occupy has in fact been revoked’ (so that the applicant is ‘homeless’) or whether, instead, the request to leave is merely a warning of an intention to terminate the licence at some future date (in which case the applicant may not be homeless, although he or she may be threatened with homelessness).

1 English Code, para 6.12; Welsh Code, para 8.11.

10.49 Beyond that, the Codes offer a confusing mix of advice on best practice in such cases. Local housing authorities are warned that there may be genuine difficulties between the guest and host that could be resolved with help. The Codes go on to suggest that local housing authorities should consider providing support, arranging family mediation services, or assisting the applicant to find alternative accommodation. Local housing authorities are reminded that they should be sensitive to the possibility that applicants may be at risk of violence or abuse if they return home. The English Code also warns that there may be collusion in order to assist the applicant to obtain housing from the local housing authority. But all this guidance leaves unasked and unanswered the important central question: whether the permission to occupy (ie the licence) has been ended or not ended.

1 English Code, para 6.13; Welsh Code, para 8.12.
2 English Code, para 6.16.
3 In Abdullah v Westminster City Council [2011] EWCA Civ 1171, [2012] HLR 5, CA, the local housing authority was not wrong in law to find that an applicant still had an implied licence to occupy where the joint tenants of the property (her mother and her husband) had asked her to leave but not taken any steps to enforce that request, and the applicant would have had matrimonial home rights to enforce her right to occupy the property. See also Complaint against Newham London Borough Council, 11 000 388, 8 March 2012 (2012) May Legal Action, p 34. See 10.124.

10.50 All too often the resolution of that simple question is deferred (quite improperly) by requiring the friend or relative, who has already told the applicant to leave, to confirm it in writing or by suggesting that a home visit at some later date will be necessary. As indicated above, save in those cases covered by the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, there is no need for notice terminating a licence to be given in writing. If the licence has been terminated, the applicant has no home to visit. Worse still, applicants are sometimes told that the local housing authority will not even entertain applications for homelessness assistance without the applicants themselves producing a letter from their former hosts requiring them to leave. This practice is, of course, an unlawful attempt to reverse the burden imposed on the local housing authority to undertake the inquiries itself, and the Welsh Code specifically precludes such practices.

1 See 10.45.
3 Welsh Code, para 8.11.

10.51 Sadly, it is often young people asked to leave their parental home (frequently in sudden and traumatic circumstances), who find it most difficult to achieve prompt decisions as to whether they are ‘homeless’ because their licence has been determined. A young person who has been told by his or her parent ‘Get out now and never set your foot in this house again’ is plainly ‘homeless’.

10.52 The English Code contains specific guidance on dealing with 16- and 17-year-olds in this situation. The Secretary of State’s view is that local housing authorities should cooperate with children’s services, with the latter being the ‘lead agency’, in order to ‘prevent homelessness and support young people to remain within the family network, wherever it is safe and appropriate to do so.’ Family mediation, external support or the offer of assistance in securing alternative accommodation are suggested as means by which homelessness may be prevented. Though, such general guidance can blur the real question: whether the licence to occupy has been ended or not. If it has, the young person is ‘homeless’.

1 English Code, para 6.15.
10.52 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

In which case, the guidance given in the English Code may be relevant to the steps taken by the local housing authority to help to secure that accommodation becomes available for the young person. See 15.138–15.189.

10.53 Similar recommendations in the previous version of the statutory guidance were considered by the House of Lords in R (M) v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council. Giving the leading judgment, Baroness Hale noted the risk of collusion but added that ‘any mediation or reconciliation will need careful brokering and housing authorities may wish to seek the assistance of social services in all such cases’.

1 [2008] UKHL 14, [2008] 1 WLR 535, HL.
2 R (M) v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council [2008] UKHL 14, [2008] 1 WLR 535, HL at [26] and [27], quoting the previous version of the English Code, paras 12.9 and 12.11. See also R (G) v Southwark London Borough Council [2009] UKHL 26, [2009] 1 WLR 2399, HL. As a result of these two House of Lords’ decisions, the Secretaries of State in England and the Welsh Assembly Government issued guidance to housing and children’s services departments: Provision of Accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless and/or require Accommodation (April 2010, CLG and DCSF) and Provision of Accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless (September 2010, Welsh Assembly Government). The former guidance has since been replaced with Prevention of homelessness and provision of accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless and/or require accommodation (April 2018, MHCLG and DfE). The guidance is on the CD Rom with this book. See also 12.133–12.159 (England) and 12.212–12.213 (Wales).

10.54 The Court of Appeal has considered the position of a 17-year-old, approaching her eighteenth birthday, who made an application for homelessness assistance having been asked to leave the family home by her mother. The local housing authority delayed making its decision until the day before her eighteenth birthday and then, unlawfully, decided that she did not have a priority need. The Court of Appeal acknowledged that ‘an authority is entitled to have time to check the genuineness of the decision to exclude the child, and indeed the reasons given by the child for being excluded, for example where there may have been collusion’. However, ‘it cannot be right that an authority can persuade a family into mediation while a child is 17 and then use the time that the mediation would take to deprive the child of a right that it would have had without mediation’. If the child genuinely has had his or her licence withdrawn, he or she will be homeless.

2 See 12.133–12.159 (England) and 12.212–12.213 (Wales).

10.55 In such circumstances the better approach may be for the local housing authority to accept that the applicant is homeless and then perform HA 1996, s 189B(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 73, relief duty to help the applicant to secure that suitable accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation, by achieving a ‘reconciliation’ under which the applicant can in future live either with his or her parents or with members of the wider family.

‘. . . enactment or rule of law’

Even if an applicant does not have any legal interest in, or licence to occupy, his or her accommodation, she or he may nevertheless be entitled to live there under an ‘enactment’ or ‘rule of law’ permitting his or her occupation or preventing another person from obtaining possession. Such occupation is treated for the purposes of HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 as though it was under a right to occupy and may prevent the applicant from being homeless.

HA 1996, s 175(1)(c); H(W)A 2014, s 55(1)(c).

As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

An ‘enactment’ in this context would normally mean an Act of Parliament. But in HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 it is defined to include ‘an enactment comprised in subordinate legislation (within the meaning of the Interpretation Act 1978)’. This wide definition brings in orders, rules, regulations, by-laws, schemes, warrants and other instruments made under any Act of Parliament. So, if any of those give a right to occupy, or inhibit someone else from recovering possession, the applicant may not be homeless.

Interpretation Act 1978, s 21.

A ‘rule of law’ is not defined in HA 1996, Pt 7 or in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. In contrast to ‘enactment’, it probably means a judge-made rule of common law, eg the rule that a licence to occupy may not normally be ended without giving reasonable notice.

Some Acts of Parliament expressly provide that individuals who are otherwise without rights may remain in possession. The classic example is the Rent Act 1977. Statutory tenants, whose contractual tenancies have ended, enjoy a personal right under the Rent Act 1977 not to be evicted without a court order, and thus fall within this category. The Codes specifically refer to Rent Act statutory tenants because their personal right to remain is created by statute. A statutory tenant remains under the protection of the Rent Act 1977 and the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 not just until a possession order has been obtained against him or her, but until the point of actual eviction by court bailiffs’.

1. Rent Act 1977, s 2.
2. English Code, para 6.10(c); Welsh Code, para 8.9(iii).

10.60 Other Acts of Parliament provide that tenancies cannot be ended without landlords obtaining possession orders. This is the case for introductory, demoted, secure and assured (including assured shorthold) tenants. Even where former tenants remain in occupation as trespassers, they are not ‘homeless’, because a different form of enactment, the procedural rules of court, restricts them from being ousted other than by a bailiff’s warrant. They do not lose the benefit of that enactment until the bailiffs actually turn them out.

2. There are complex provisions, which are beyond the scope of this text, governing when tenancies end on or after the making of a possession order. All assured tenants remain tenants until any possession order is executed against them (Knowsley Housing Trust v White [2008] UKHL 70, [2009] HLR 17, HL). Since 20 May 2009, secure tenants have been in the same position (Housing Act 1985, s 82 as amended by Housing and Regeneration Act 2008, s 299 and Sch 11). There were certain ‘tolerated trespassers’ who had originally been secure tenants until they were subject to outright or suspended possession orders made before 20 May 2009. Most of them became holders of ‘replacement tenancies’ on 20 May 2009 (Housing and Regeneration Act 2008, Sch 11, Part 2).

10.61 Anyone who is occupying premises where a possession order has been obtained but has not yet been executed will remain entitled to occupy those premises under an enactment or rule of law, until actually evicted by the bailiffs.

1. R (Sacupima) v Newham London Borough Council (2001) 33 HLR 2, CA. However this does not necessarily mean that the individual is not homeless, or that the local housing authority from which he or she has sought homelessness assistance do not owe him or her a duty. If the possession order is to be executed within 56 days, the applicant will be threatened with homelessness. See 10.110–10.116. Alternatively, the applicant might be homeless because it is not reasonable for him or her, and his or her household, to continue to occupy the accommodation until the date of the eviction, see 10.110–10.116. On 9 December 2015 the Court of Appeal granted permission to appeal in the case of Michalczyk v London Borough of Southwark [2015] EWCA Civ 1501, to explore whether there was any inconsistency between the approach in Sacupima whereby an applicant is still deemed to have an entitlement to occupy his or her accommodation under an ‘enactment or rule of law’ until the possession order is executed and the approach discussed at 10.111 and 10.113 whereby a local housing authority may, nevertheless, decide that the applicant is homeless as the accommodation is not reasonable for him or her to continue to occupy. At the time of writing the appeal has not yet taken place.

10.62 It is not possible to set out in this text details of all the primary and secondary legislation giving rights to remain in occupation of accommodation or restricting the rights of others to recover possession. Spouses, civil partners, and cohabitants may have rights to remain in their homes under the Family Law Act 1996.

2. Those matrimonial home rights need not have been exercised in order to give a person a right to remain. Where a woman was asked to leave by her mother and her husband, who were the joint tenants of the property, she was not homeless because she could bring a claim under Family Law Act 1996, s 30, to enforce her right of occupation in the property: Abdullah v Westminster City Council [2011] EWCA Civ 1171, [2012] HLR 5, CA. If she had obtained an order, she would be not homeless by virtue of HA 1996, s 175(2)(a), see 10.39. See also 10.49 fn 3 for the additional factual background to Abdullah v Westminster City Council [2011] EWCA Civ 1171, [2012] HLR 5, CA.

10.63 It must not be assumed that all residential occupiers have the benefit of enactments or rules of law enabling them to remain in occupation or restricting others from recovering possession. True trespassers – squatters who have entered property without authority – have no such rights and are ‘homeless’ throughout.

10.64 Even in relation to former tenants and licensees, the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 is not comprehensive. There are very many occupiers who are excepted from its protection and will become ‘homeless’ as soon as their tenancies or licences end. That is precisely because there is no legal right to remain, nor any restriction on their eviction. A list of those excluded from the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 is found at s 3A of that Act. It includes those living with resident landlords, occupying holiday lets or subject to licences granted not for money or money’s worth.

Note, that some forms of accommodation that are not listed expressly in PEA 1977, s 3A may still fall outside of the protection of that Act, where the accommodation is not classed as a ‘dwelling’ within the meaning of PEA 1977, s 3. See R (N) v Lewisham London Borough Council [2014] UKSC 62, [2015] HLR 6, SC.

Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s 3A.

10.65 There are many people – owners, tenants, former tenants and former licensees – who have no defence to an inevitable possession order, but who do have the benefit of the protection of an enactment or rule of law preventing their eviction. They will not automatically be ‘homeless’ (in that they have accommodation that are entitled to occupy) unless they are re-applying for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England within two years of acceptance of a private rented sector offer and have been served with a valid Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice. However, if the mortgage lender, landlord, former landlord or former licensor is taking steps to obtain a possession order, it may not be reasonable for them to continue in occupation and they may nevertheless be ‘homeless’.

Can the applicant secure entry to the accommodation?

10.66 Even if there is ‘accommodation’ which is ‘available’ and which the applicant is ‘entitled to occupy’, he or she will still be homeless if he or she is physically barred from entering the property. The examples given in the Codes are where an occupier has been illegally evicted, or comes home to find his or her accommodation occupied by squatters. But those examples are far from exhaustive. The property may be cut off temporarily by floodwaters or sealed behind a police barrier. An emergency may have rendered it temporarily impossible to enter the property. Whatever the cause, if the applicant physically cannot enter (and has no other accommodation meeting the legal definition) he or she is ‘homeless’.

10.67 Even though practical or legal remedies to gain entry at some later stage will usually be available to the applicant, he or she remains homeless until entry can be secured. Local housing authorities cannot, therefore, decide that the applicant is not homeless because he or she has not yet exhausted all legal and practical remedies to secure entry (although they can, of course, give advice on the remedies available). To put it in the language of the English Code, ‘. . . an authority cannot refuse to assist an applicant who is homeless and eligible for assistance under Pt 7 simply because such remedies are available’.

1 English Code, para 6.21. See also Welsh Code, para 8.17 which stipulates that the local housing authority ‘must treat the applicant as homeless until re-entry is secured’.

The special rule for mobile homes

10.68 A local housing authority may find that an applicant has ‘accommodation’ in the form of a moveable structure (eg a mobile home or towing caravan), or in the form of a vehicle or vessel designed for, or adapted for, human habitation. The latter category includes not only purpose built caravanettes and houseboats but also adapted or converted buses, lorries, vans and boats.

10.69 An applicant who has a right to occupy such accommodation, which is available to him or her, will be homeless unless he or she has a place where he or she is permitted or entitled both to place it and to reside in it. Simply having a place to put or park the mobile home is not enough. The applicant must also be entitled to live in it at that location.

10.70 Typically, a mobile home occupier has a licence to station and live in his or her home on a particular plot or to tie up and live in his or her boat at a particular mooring. The Codes advise that, where an applicant has an itinerant lifestyle, the site or mooring need not be permanent in order to avoid homelessness1. But it is quite common for those with mobile homes to have no permission to stay anywhere. Such travellers would obviously be ‘homeless’, however comfortable their mobile accommodation.

1 English Code, para 6.22; Welsh Code, para 8.18.

10.71 A person who has a licence to bring his or her mobile home onto a particular piece of land to live in it has an entitlement or permission to ‘place it and to reside in it’ and would therefore not be homeless1. So, a houseboat owner with permission to use and live in the houseboat on a particular waterway is not homeless. If the licence then expires, but no proceedings are brought and he or she continues to occupy the land (or water), he or she may or may not be homeless, depending upon whether it can be inferred from the landowners’ inaction that the permission is continuing. If an occupier is required to leave a site, but has another site to go to, he or she will not be homeless. If, on the other hand, an occupier is required to leave and has no alternative provision in place, he or she will be homeless. An occupier who is camping unlawfully, and never had the right or permission to occupy the land, is homeless throughout.

5 As would have been the case in Jones v Canal and River Trust [2017] EWCA Civ 135, [2017] HLR 24, CA; a possession claim where the relief sought by the Canal and River Trust would have required Mr Jones to remove his boat from the Kennet and Avon canal and refrain from using it on any of the extensive network of waterways which are controlled by the Trust.
6 Higgs v Brighton and Hove City Council [2003] EWCA Civ 895, [2004] HLR 2, CA. This was the factual situation in R (Plant) v Somerset County Council and Taunton Deane Borough Council [2016] EWHC 1245 (Admin), [2016] HLR 24, CA, where Mr Plant, without permission, moved his motor home and workshop on to land owned by Somerset Council. Taunton Deane Borough Council later accepted the main housing duty at HA 1996, s 193(2) toward him.

10.72 Local Government Ombudsman investigations have found maladministration where caravan-dwellers were subject to imminent eviction proceedings but the local housing authorities refused to accept them as homeless.

Is the accommodation reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy?

10.73 If the applicant has accommodation which is ‘available’, which he or she is ‘entitled to occupy’, and to which entry can be secured, that would, before 1986, have been sufficient to demonstrate that he or she was not homeless. But that approach could and did produce absurd results. It paid no attention to the quality, condition or appropriateness of the accommodation for the applicant and his or her family. The narrowness of the definition was amply demonstrated by the finding in the Puhlbofer case that a family of four occupying a small squalid single room in a guest house was not homeless. As a direct response to that decision, in 1986, Parliament enlarged the definition of ‘homeless’ so that, as well as fulfilling all other parts of the statutory definition, the accommodation in question also has to be ‘reasonable’ for the applicant to continue to occupy.

10.73 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

6 HA 1996, s 175(3); H(W)A 2014, s 55(3).

10.74 The words ‘continue to occupy’ refer to Parliament’s intention to deal specifically with accommodation that an applicant already ‘has’, and is therefore occupying, rather than accommodation that the applicant has left. The Court of Appeal has held that the words ‘continue to occupy’ mean that the question of reasonableness of occupation is relevant to any accommodation that is ‘available’ to the applicant, whether or not she or he is actually occupying it.

2 Waltham Forest London Borough Council v Maloba [2007] EWCA Civ 1271, [2008] HLR 26, CA, which considered the dicta in Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council (2000) 32 HLR 445, CA and held that Begum was wrongly decided on this point.

10.75 The words ‘continue to occupy’ look to occupation over time and suggest an element of looking to the future. This means that accommodation could be considered not to be reasonable to continue to occupy, even though the occupiers could get by in it for a little while longer.

10.76 The words ‘. . . shall not be treated as having accommodation unless it is accommodation which would be reasonable for him to continue to occupy’ used in HA 1996, s 175(3) and H(W)A 2014, s 55(3), might suggest that a local housing authority had to probe, with the applicant, every conceivable aspect of the existing property to establish whether or not it was reasonable to occupy. That would be unworkable. A local housing authority must always consider whether or not the accommodation is affordable for the applicant. A local housing authority must also make inquiries into any other material before it that might lead it to conclude that the accommodation would not be reasonable to continue to occupy.

10.77 Once a finding has been made that accommodation is not reasonable for an applicant to continue to occupy, the applicant is homeless and, providing he or she is also eligible for assistance, the HA 1996, s 189B(2)

10.78 There are two distinct circumstances in which accommodation will not be reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy:
Definition of ‘homeless’ 10.81

(1) where the circumstances are such that HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 deems the accommodation to be unreasonable to continue to occupy; or

(2) where the circumstances are such that, as a matter of fact, the accommodation is not reasonable to continue to occupy.

Deemed unreasonableness

10.79 If it is ‘probable’ that continued occupation of the accommodation will lead to ‘domestic violence or other violence’ (for applicants in England) or ‘abuse’ (for applicants in Wales) against the applicant or against a member of the applicant’s household, the accommodation is deemed not to be reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy and the applicant is homeless. The local housing authority’s inquiries are simply confined to finding the facts necessary to answer the question of whether such violence or abuse is probable. Note that there are certain differences between the deeming provisions in England and Wales.

1 HA 1996, s 177(1)(a) and (b); H(W)A 2014, s 57(1) and (2). For this purpose household membership is defined at H(W)A 2014, s 57(2). See 10.21–10.32.

2 HA 1996, s 177(1); H(W)A 2014, s 57(1). According to St Mungo’s Broadway, a charity that assists homeless persons, over half of its female clients have experienced domestic violence, Rough Justice: uncovering social policies that create homelessness (Commonweal housing, 2014).

3 See 10.81–10.91.

4 See 10.92–10.98.

10.80 Situations of violence and abuse are currently the only circumstances in which accommodation is deemed to be unreasonable to continue to occupy. There is provision within HA 1996, Pt 7 and in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 for the Secretary of State and the Welsh Ministers, respectively, to specify by order other circumstances in which accommodation should be regarded, as a matter of law, as reasonable or not reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy. This power has not yet been exercised either in England or in Wales.

2 HA 1996, s 177(3)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 57(4).

England

10.81 For the purposes of the deeming provision, ‘violence’ means ‘violence from another person; or threats of violence from another person which are likely to be carried out’. Although HA 1996, Pt 7 refers to ‘threats’ of violence, this can include a single threat of violence. It is ‘domestic violence’ if the violence or threats of violence come from ‘a person who is associated with the victim’.

1 HA 1996, s 177(1A).
10.81 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

2 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

3 Interpretation Act 1978, s 6(c): ‘... unless the contrary intention appears ... words in the singular include the plural and words in the plural include the singular.’

4 HA 1996, s 177(1A).

10.82 The modern approach is to understand ‘violence’ as a very broad concept. The English Code records the Secretary of State’s opinion that ‘the term “violence” should not be given a restrictive meaning’ and that:

““domestic violence” should be understood to include threatening behaviour, violence or abuse (psychological, physical, sexual, financial or emotional) between persons who are, or have been, intimate partners, family members or members of the same household, regardless of gender or sexuality.”

10.83 The Supreme Court has held that the term ‘domestic violence’ should be interpreted in the same sense as it is used in family proceedings: ‘[d]omestic violence includes physical violence, threatening or intimidating behaviour and any other form of abuse which, directly or indirectly may give rise to the risk of harm’. It follows that, where it is probable that an applicant would be subject to abuse that may give rise to harm, but would not necessarily be subject to physical violence, she or he will be deemed to be homeless under HA 1996, s 177(1) if that abuse comes from a person who is associated with the victim. The Supreme Court declined to decide whether this extended definition of violence should also apply to people who might be fleeing from violence that was not domestic violence, as the question did not arise on the facts of that case. The matter has since fallen for consideration by the Court of Appeal, which determined that the extended definition of violence should also be applied to violence that is not domestic violence. However, conduct will not normally be capable of being described as ‘violent’, as opposed to merely anti-social, unless it is of such a nature and seriousness as to be liable to cause psychological harm. The phrase connotes something more than transient upset or distress.

2 Yemshaw v Hounslow London Borough Council [2011] UKSC 3, [2011] 1 WLR 433, [2011] HLR 16, SC, Baroness Hale said: ‘[p]eople who are at risk of intimidating or harmful behaviour from their near neighbours are equally worthy of protection as are those who run the same risk from their relatives. But it may be less likely that they will suffer harm as a result of the abusive behaviour of their neighbours than it is in the domestic context. In practice, the threshold of seriousness may be higher’ at [35]. The wording of the English Code potentially contains the same distinction: English Code, para 21.19.

10.84 The English Code contains a chapter dedicated to assisting local housing authorities in England with the identification and management of cases involving domestic violence. Applying the extended definition of domestic violence advocated by the Supreme Court in Yemshaw v Hounslow London Borough Council, the English Code advises local housing authorities to be alive to (among other things) controlling and coercive behaviour, financial emotional abuse and 'so-called honour based abuse', including forced marriage and female genital mutilation and reminds decision makers that ‘the impacts may be different on different groups of people’.

1 English Code, chapter 21 incorporating much of the material previously found in the Supplementary guidance on domestic abuse and homelessness (Department for Communities and Local Government, November 2014) which has now been withdrawn.

3 English Code, paras 21.4–21.7.

4 English Code, para 21.9.

10.85 ‘A person who is associated with the victim’ is exhaustively defined in HA 1996, s 178. If the relationship between the perpetrator and the victim does not fall within the statutory definition, the violence cannot be domestic violence (but will be ‘other violence’). The English Code reiterates that the question of whether the violence is ‘domestic’ or not turns on the relationship between the perpetrator and the victim; not on where the violence took place. The statutory definition of ‘associated person’ is very widely drawn, so as to include both existing and former spouses, civil partners, cohabitants, any person who has lived in the same household as the victim, any blood relation or relation by marriage, cohabitation or civil partnership, and any person who shares the parentage of, or parental responsibility for, a child with the victim (including adoptive parents in their relationship to natural parents).

1 English Code, paras 21.2.

2 Civil Partnership Act 2004, s 81 and Sch 8, para 61 amended HA 1996, s 178 to include references to civil partnerships and same sex couples living together as though they were civil partners, in force from 5 December 2005. Paragraph 21.18 of the English Code contains an up-to-date list, but wrongly omits relatives of a civil partner or former civil partner (para 21.18(e)).

10.86 Before the implementation of the Homelessness Act 2002, only ‘domestic’ violence led to a deeming that it would not be reasonable for an applicant to continue to occupy accommodation. Since the amendment made by the Homelessness Act 2002, which inserted ‘or other violence’ into the deeming section, it is no longer necessary for local housing authorities to distinguish between domestic or other violence for the purposes of taking a decision on whether an applicant is homeless. Where it is probable that continued occupation of the accommodation will lead to violence or threats of violence that are likely to be carried out against the applicant or a member of his or her household, that accommodation cannot be reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy, whoever the violence (or threat of it) comes from. Following the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hussain v Waltham Forest London Borough Council, the distinction between ‘domestic’ violence and ‘other violence’ is of relatively little practical significance, save in circumstances where a local housing authority is considering a referral under the local connection provisions.

1 Homelessness Act 2002, s 10. During its passage the Minister specifically referred to racial violence as falling within this provision (Hansard, SC, 10 July 2001, Sally Keeble MP).

10.86 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

10.87 The test is not whether there has been violence in the past, or whether violence will definitely occur in the future. The question for the local housing authority is whether it is ‘probable’ that continued occupation of the accommodation would lead either to violence, or to threats of violence which are likely to be carried out. The Court of Appeal set aside a local housing authority’s decision that an applicant was not homeless because she could have invoked legal remedies in order to prevent a recurrence of domestic violence. The local housing authority had asked itself the wrong question and had taken into account wider considerations (including whether the applicant had acted reasonably) rather than confining itself to the probability of her being subject to violence or threats of violence likely to be carried out if she remained in her accommodation. ‘Probable’ means ‘more likely than not’. ‘Likely’ in the context of ‘threats of violence’ includes ‘a real or serious possibility’. If, therefore, it is more likely than not that an applicant’s continued occupation of his or her home will lead to violence, or to threats of violence where there is a real or serious possibility that those threats will be carried out, the applicant will be homeless.

1 Bond v Leicester City Council [2001] EWCA Civ 1544, [2002] HLR 6, CA.

2 Bond v Leicester City Council [2001] EWCA Civ 1544, [2002] HLR 6, CA per Hale LJ at [35].

10.88 Local housing authorities are entitled to advise applicants about any legal or practical remedies (obtaining injunctions, improving security, etc), but such remedies should only be pursued where the applicant wishes to do so and local housing authorities should be mindful that injunctions may not be effective in deterring some perpetrators. The safety of the applicant and his or her household must be the primary consideration at all stages. Local housing authorities are also advised that the fact that violence has not yet occurred does not mean that it is not likely to occur; and that (particularly in cases of domestic violence) they should not necessarily expect direct evidence of violence to be available from the applicant.

2 English Code, para 21.31. This need for safety will necessitate careful inquiries into the application. See Chapter 9: In Purewal v Ealing London Borough Council [2013] EWCA Civ 1579, [2014] HLR 5, CA, a review decision that an applicant was not homeless, because it was not probable that she would be subject to sexual assault or rape from a neighbour if she continued to occupy her accommodation, was quashed. The local housing authority had failed to make all necessary inquiries into the issue. Specifically, it had failed to obtain a copy of key witness statement which the applicant had given to the police.

10.89 The definition of ‘violence’ and ‘threats of violence’ as coming ‘from another person’ means that the risk of self-harm from continued occupation of accommodation does not put an applicant into this deemed unreasonableness category (although any risk of self-harm may be relevant to the broader test of whether the accommodation is reasonable to continue to occupy, as a matter of fact).

10.90 The local housing authority cannot take into account, when determining whether an applicant falls within this deemed unreasonableness category, general housing circumstances prevailing in its district. The local housing authority can only consider the applicant’s individual circumstances and that of his or her household.

10.91 Where there is harassment falling short of actual violence or threats of violence that are likely to be carried out, the accommodation will not be deemed to be unreasonable for the applicant and members of his or her household to continue to occupy, but may be as a matter of fact unreasonable for them to continue to occupy⁴.

See 10.129.

Wales

10.92 The position for local housing authorities in Wales is very similar to that for local housing authorities in England and H(W)A 2014, ss 57–58,

10.93 Under H(W)A 2014, s 57(1) it is not reasonable for a person to continue to occupy accommodation if it is ‘probable that it will lead to the person, or a member of the person’s household, being subjected to abuse’.

10.94 Probable, in the context of the risk of a person being subjected to abuse, means ‘more likely than not’. ‘Likely’ in the context of ‘threats of violence’ includes ‘a real or serious possibility’¹.

10.95 Abuse has been defined in H(W)A 2014, s 58 to reflect the extended definition of domestic violence given in Yemshaw v Hounslow London Borough Council¹. Specifically ‘abuse’ means physical violence, threatening or intimidating behaviour and any other form of abuse which, directly or indirectly, may give rise to the risk of harm². The Welsh Code advises that the likelihood of a threat of abuse being carried out should not be based on whether there has been actual abuse in the past³. In cases involving abuse, local housing authorities may wish to inform applicants of the option of seeking an injunction, but there is no obligation for the applicant then to do so⁴.

² H(W)A 2014, s 58(1).
³ Welsh Code, para 8.23.
⁴ Welsh Code, para 8.24.

10.96 Abuse is ‘domestic abuse’ where the victim is ‘associated with the abuser’¹. The abuser will be associated with the victim where he or she falls within one of the relationships listed in H(W)A 2014, s 58(2). The list is exhaustive. The relationships set out in that section mirror those in HA 1996, s 178, though the wording has been modernised². Surprisingly, given that domestic abuse will often occur in the context of a parent and child, the word ‘child’ is left undefined. However, it may be inferred from H(W)A 2014, s 96, which refers to children and persons under 18 synonymously, that, as under HA 1996, s 178, a child is a person under the age of 18.

10.96 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

2 Housing (Wales) Bill, Explanatory Memorandum (Welsh Government, November 2013), p 158.

10.97 ‘Member of a person’s household’ means a person who normally resides with the applicant as member of his or her family, or any other person who might reasonably be expected to reside with the applicant.

10.98 The most obvious distinction between this particular aspect of the respective regimes under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 and HA 1996, Pt 7 is that under H(W)A 2014, s 57 the terms ‘violence’ and ‘domestic violence’ as used in HA 1996, s 177 have been substituted with ‘abuse’ and ‘domestic abuse’. The purpose of this amendment was said to be in order ‘to reflect the way case law has interpreted the 1996 Act’.

Actually, this amendment, which was enacted prior to the decision in Hussain v Waltham Forest London Borough Council, went rather further than the existing case law which had, hitherto, refrained from applying the extended definition of violence, outside of the domestic context. However, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hussain v Waltham Forest London Borough Council means that this distinction is now of little, if any, practical significance and that the deemed unreasonableness provisions in both England and Wales are virtually identical.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 Housing (Wales) Bill, Explanatory Memorandum (Welsh Government, November 2013) 158. See also Welsh Code, para 8.22.

Factual unreasonableness

10.99 As a matter of fact, accommodation may not be reasonable for an applicant to continue to occupy. This is a much broader question for a local housing authority to determine than the relatively narrow deemed unreasonableness category. It is always required to consider whether or not the accommodation is ‘affordable’ for the applicant. It should also take into account any other relevant matters, including all those raised by the applicant. In making its decision as to whether or not the accommodation is reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy, the local housing authority may, but is not obliged to, have regard to the general housing circumstances prevailing in its district.

1 HA 1996, s 177(3)(b); Homelessness (Suitability of Accommodation) Order 1996, SI 1996/3204 at Appendix 2; H(W)A 2014, s 57(3)(b).

2 HA 1996, s 177(2); H(W)A 2014, s 57(3)(a).

10.100 The phrase ‘reasonable to continue to occupy’ is also used as part of the definition of intentional homelessness. Case law and guidance relating to that part of the definition of intentional homelessness applies to the interpret-
10.101 Both Codes contain the advice that ‘[t]here is no simple test of reasonableness’. Each case will require an individual assessment involving consideration of the applicant’s circumstances and (if the local housing authority elects to have regard to them) the general housing conditions in the district.

1 English Code, para 6.23; Welsh Code, para 8.20.

10.102 As already noted, a local housing authority must always consider whether the applicant can afford to occupy the accommodation, and should then also consider any other relevant issues, whether raised directly by the applicant or becoming apparent during the local housing authority’s inquiries. Examples of matters that might be relevant are given in the Codes, but the scope of the local housing authority’s inquiries is not confined to those examples. Any matter that appears to be relevant must be considered. The question of reasonableness is not limited to the characteristics of the accommodation alone; it can include other factors such as whether the applicant has access to employment or to welfare benefits in the place (or country) where the accommodation is located.

1 English Code, paras 6.26–6.40; Welsh Code, paras 8.21–8.31.

10.103 The Court of Appeal has set out a useful list of indicative factors that might be taken into account when considering whether any accommodation is reasonable to continue to occupy. The House of Lords allowed an appeal in that case against the Court of Appeal’s decision that women’s refuges were accommodation that might be reasonable to continue to occupy, but did not specifically overrule the list. Those factors are:

- the size, type and quality of the available accommodation, including the extent of any need to share its facilities;
- the terms of the agreement by which it is made available;
- the ability to afford it;
- the appropriateness of its location for an applicant and child (if any);
- the extent of its facilities;
- its appropriateness in the light of any particular characteristics (including as to health);
- the length of time for which the applicant has already occupied it;
- the state of physical and emotional health of the applicant while in occupation of it; and
- the length of time for which, unless accepted as homeless, they might expect to continue to occupy it.

10.104 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

General circumstances prevailing in relation to housing in the local housing authority’s district

10.104 The local housing authority may, but is not obliged to, take into account ‘the general circumstances prevailing in relation to housing in the district of the local housing authority to whom [the applicant] has applied’¹. The Codes give two examples of when such a comparison might be appropriate: where the application is based on the physical condition of the property, or on overcrowding². Other circumstances that local housing authorities have lawfully taken into account include the demands for housing in the local housing authority’s area³, its capacity to absorb and accommodate homeless families⁴, the shortage of supply⁵, and conflicts of lifestyle in multi-occupied homes⁶. A reasonably up-to-date picture of general housing conditions in a local housing authority’s district will be available from the local housing authority’s own local homelessness review⁷. Local housing authorities should ensure that they are taking into account ‘general’ housing conditions, rather than applying a narrower test. A decision that compared the applicant’s degree of overcrowding only with that of others on the local housing register was overturned because those others were, by definition, in the most housing need⁸.

10.105 It is the local housing authority that is in the best position to assess the seriousness of the general conditions relating to housing in its area, and the extent to which an applicant’s complaints might take his or her case out of the norm and make it unreasonable to continue in occupation¹. It follows that applicants who apply to hard-pressed local housing authorities will find that satisfying the local housing authority that accommodation is not reasonable for them to continue to occupy is a harder task than if they had applied to local housing authorities with more accommodation available².

10.106 The following paragraphs deal with the more common situations in which questions arise about factual reasonableness to continue to occupy.
Affordability

10.107 Accommodation is not reasonable for an applicant to continue to occupy if the cost of paying for it would deprive the applicant of the means to provide for ‘the ordinary necessities of life’\(^1\). What constitutes ‘the ordinary necessities of life’ is a question of fact and can vary according to each applicant’s needs. Care must be taken in evaluating these needs. A broad assertion by a local housing authority that an applicant’s expenditure is exaggerated and that his or her accommodation is affordable, without any consideration of which items of expenditure could be reduced or why, will not be lawful\(^2\). The guidance in the Codes is also relevant. The English Code advises (in the context of assessing the suitability\(^4\) of accommodation) that local housing authorities consider ‘whether the applicant can afford the housing costs without being deprived of basic essentials such as food, clothing, heating, transport and other essentials specific to their circumstances\(^5\). The Welsh Code provides that ‘the Secretary of State recommends that housing authorities regard accommodation as not being affordable if the applicant would be left with a residual income which would be less than the level of income support or income-based jobseekers allowance that is applicable in respect of the applicant, or would be applicable if he or she was entitled to claim such benefit\(^6\). Where an applicant is in receipt of other benefits, such as child benefit or child tax credit, there is no rule of law that such benefits are not intended to be used toward housing, or that there is no flexibility within such income for the payment of housing costs.

4 See Chapter 18.
5 English Code, para 17.45.
6 Welsh Code, para 19.28. When applying this paragraph, local housing authorities should not confine themselves to the specified benefits which only apply to adult claimants, but also consider the level of equivalent benefits paid in respect of the entire household, such as child tax credits/Eryurekler v Hackney London Borough Council (2010) May Legal Action, p 24, Clerkenwell and Shoreditch County Court. Specific reference to this particular passage of the Code may not be needed as long as the local housing authority adopts ‘the kind of analysis’ envisaged in the Code. Birmingham City Council v Balog [2013] EWCA Civ 1582, [2014] HLR 14, CA per Kitchin LJ at [50].
7 Samuels v Birmingham City Council [2015] EWCA Civ 1051, [2016] PTSR 558, CA. The Supreme Court has granted permission to appeal against this decision.

10.108 A local housing authority in England is specifically required by statutory instrument to consider the whole of the applicant’s financial resources as against the cost of the accommodation, any child support or other payments that the applicant is required to make, and all the applicant’s other reasonable living expenses\(^1\).

10.109 These considerations are mirrored at H(W)A 2014, s 59(2)\(^1\) and in the Welsh Code\(^2\). The Welsh Code also advises local housing authorities to be mindful of the changes in entitlement to housing benefit that have taken effect.
10.109 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

since April 2011, stipulating that ‘households should not be penalised for the loss of accommodation where it was due to an unavoidable change in their welfare benefits that led to the accommodation becoming unaffordable’\(^3\). In practice, a similar approach has been adopted by the county court\(^4\) in the context of HA 1996, Pt 7\(^5\).

4 In Magoury v Brent London Borough Council (2016) February Legal Action, p 46, County Court at Central London, a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally was quashed where there had been a failure to consider whether she would have become homeless anyway as a result of the benefit cap. Similarly, Barker v Watford City Council (2017) July/August Legal Action, p 42, County Court at Central London, involved a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally in circumstances where she had lost her accommodation as a result of welfare reforms which left a shortfall between her housing benefit award and her rent. The local housing authority decided that the applicant’s property was affordable, and therefore reasonable to continue to occupy, as she could have applied for discretionary housing payments. The decision was quashed on appeal. The local housing authority had failed to make any inquiries to establish whether such an application would succeed or for how long any award would be made See \(13.77\).

IMMINENT OR ACTUAL POSSESSION PROCEEDINGS

10.110 The approach to be taken where an applicant facing imminent or actual possession proceedings seeks homelessness assistance varies slightly as between local housing authorities in England and in Wales. It is convenient to set out the position in Wales first.

Wales

10.111 In Wales, where an applicant is entitled to occupy rented accommodation, because no possession order has yet been obtained, but possession proceedings are imminent or have been started, the local housing authority should consider whether in those circumstances it is reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy until the possession order has been obtained, and executed. Factors that the local housing authority should take into account include: the general cost to the local housing authority of accepting the applicant as ‘homeless’ at that stage; the position of the tenant; the position of the landlord; the likelihood that the landlord will actually proceed (or continue) with the possession claim; the burden on the courts of unnecessary proceedings where there is no defence to a claim for possession; and the general housing circumstances prevailing in the local housing authority’s district\(^1\). The Welsh Code suggests that it is unlikely to be reasonable for an assured shorthold tenant (who has received a proper statutory notice)\(^2\) to continue to occupy where the local housing authority is satisfied that the landlord intends to seek possession and where there would be no defence to a possession claim\(^1\). This guidance would also apply to other occupiers faced with imminent possession proceedings to which they have no defence and who would therefore become liable to pay the costs of those proceedings\(^4\). Similarly, case law has stressed that ‘it is undesirable that a tenant, or an ex-tenant, in those circumstances should be required to hang on till the bitter end and require a court order. However, the decision as to the imminence of possession proceedings, and whether or not an applicant would have a defence, is a question of fact for the local housing authority.

2 Complying with Housing Act 1988, s 21.
3 Welsh Code, para 8.31(a). The Welsh Code disapplies this advice where the local housing authority is taking steps to persuade the landlord to withdraw the notice or to allow the tenant to continue to occupy the accommodation for a reasonable period.

In Khadija Ali v Bristol City Council (2007) October Legal Action, p 26, Bristol County Court, the review decision was defective because there was no reference to the guidance given in the Code, or any explanation of the reviewing officer’s decision to depart from it.

England

10.112 From 2006 onward the English Code contained similar guidance to that which is applicable in Wales. But despite this clear guidance it was not unusual for local housing authorities to advise occupiers facing imminent or actual possession proceedings to remain in occupation until a court order was obtained and executed. This prompted the then Minister of State for Housing and Planning, Brandon Lewis MP, to write to all local housing authorities in England in June 2016, urging them to follow the guidance set out in the English Code and to avoid ‘routinely’ . . . advising tenants to stay until the bailiffs arrive. It was the mischief identified here which the new HA 1996, s 175(5) seeks to remedy. HA 1996, s 175(5) applies to applicants who have been served with a valid Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice. Such applicants are deemed to be threatened with homelessness throughout the 56-day period leading up to the expiry of the notice. This means that the applicant will be owed the HA 1996, s 195(2) prevention duty and that the local housing authority must take reasonable steps to help the applicant to secure that accommodation does not cease to be available for his or her occupation. Those reasonable steps might include negotiating with the landlord for a further assured shorthold tenancy. The idea behind this duty is to ‘tackle the bad practice whereby some local authorities advise tenants to remain in properties until the bailiffs arrive’ and to ‘help to reduce evictions from privately rented accommodation and facilitate less disruptive moves to alternative housing when tenants do have to move’.

8 As amended by HRA 2017, s 4 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.87–15.137.

10.113 This new deeming provision applies only to occupiers who have been served with a valid notice under HA 1988, s 21 which is due to expire with 56 days. Accordingly, when a local housing authority in England receives an application for homelessness assistance from an occupier who has been served with:

- a notice other than one under HA 1998, s 21;
- a notice under HA 1988, s 21 that is not valid;
- a notice under HA 1988, s 21 that will expire in excess of 56 days; or
- a notice under HA 1988, s 21 notice that has expired, it should continue to treat that application in accordance with the principles that applied prior to the coming into force of HA 1996, s 175(5) and consider whether, in the circumstances, it is reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy the accommodation. If it is not reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy the accommodation then he or she will be homeless.

1 In this scenario, the deeming provision under HA 1996, s 175(5) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 1(3) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, will still apply but only once sufficient time has passed so that the notice is within 56 days of expiry.

2 The effect of the HA 1988, s 21 duty expiring during the performance of the HA 1996, s 175(2), prevention duty is discussed at 15.111. In outline, although the applicant will no longer fall within the scope of HA 1996, s 175(5) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 1(3) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) the local housing authority must continue to take reasonable steps to help him or her to secure that accommodation does not cease to be available for his or her occupation. He or she cannot be “timed out” of the prevention duty. See HA 1996, s 175(5)(6) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 4(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) and English Code, para 6.30. This allows the applicant to retain the benefit of the prevention duty unless the local housing authority concludes that matters have actually reached the stage where the applicant might now properly be regarded as homeless rather than threatened with homelessness. Importantly, the expiry of the HA 1988, s 21 notice does not compel a conclusion that the applicant has transitioned from being threatened with homelessness to being homeless. Whether that transition has taken place will depend on the circumstances of the case. See English Code, paras 6.31–6.32.

3 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 1(3) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

4 See English Code, paras 6.32–6.33 for factors that may be relevant to this assessment and 10.111 on the approach in Wales, which reflects the approach in England prior to the coming into force of HA 1996, s 175(5), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 1(3) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

10.114 The Secretary of State advises that where an applicant who has been served with a valid notice under HA 1988, s 21 would have no defence to possession proceedings, and where the local housing authority is satisfied that further efforts to persuade the landlord to allow the applicant to stay in the property would be unlikely to succeed, then it is unlikely to be reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy the accommodation beyond the expiry of the notice. The combined effect of HA 1996, s 175(5) and the guidance given in the English Code, is that an applicant served with a valid HA 1988, s 21 notice, will be threatened with homelessness in the 56-day period leading up to the expiry of the notice and is likely to be homeless thereafter.

1 English Code, para 6.35.
2 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 1(3) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

10.115 In all cases, irrespective of the legal basis of the possession proceedings (ie whether the proceedings have been brought pursuant to HA 1988, s 21 or otherwise), the practice of requiring an applicant to remain in his or her accommodation after the making of a possession order is deprecated. In particular, the English Code provides that:

- it is highly unlikely to be reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy once a court has issued an order for possession;
- local housing authorities should not consider it reasonable for an applicant to remain in occupation up until the point at which a court issues a warrant or writ to enforce an order for possession; and
- local housing authorities should ensure that homeless families and vulnerable individuals who are owed an accommodation duty are not evicted through the enforcement of an order for possession as a result of a failure by the authority to make suitable accommodation available to them.

1 English Code, para 6.36.
2 English Code, para 6.37.
3 See Chapter 16.
4 English Code, para 6.38.

10.116 A further distinction as between the law in England and in Wales is that under HA 1996, Pt 7 applicants to local housing authorities in England who are re-applying for homelessness assistance within two years of acceptance of a private rented sector offer and who have been served with a valid HA 1988, s 21 notice will be deemed to be homeless from the date of the expiry of the notice.

3 HA 1996, s 195A(2) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 8.100–8.107 and 10.135–10.143.

PHYSICAL CONDITIONS

10.117 The English Code suggests that the local housing authority ask itself:
10.117 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

... whether the condition of the property was so bad in comparison with other accommodation in the district that it would not be reasonable to expect someone to continue to live there.'

1 English Code, para 6.26. Though this requirement to consider the physical condition of the property does not necessarily require a hazard assessment under the Housing Act 2004. Such an assessment may be necessary in considering whether the accommodation is suitable within the meaning of HA 1996, s 206 and s 210 and H(W)A 2014, s 59. See Chapter 18. But the questions of whether accommodation is ‘reasonable ... to continue to occupy’ and whether it is ‘suitable’ are distinct, though they will often lead to the same result. See Temur v Hackney London Borough Council [2014] EWCA Civ 877, [2014] HLR 39, CA, dealing with both the requirement for a hazard assessment and the distinction between ‘suitability’ and ‘reasonable to continue to occupy’.

10.118 The Welsh Code repeats that proposed test, but also refers to the question of whether the property is unsuitable for human habitation and to the Housing, Health and Safety Rating System 1. It also draws attention to the particular needs of disabled people, and the needs of children 2.

2 Welsh Code, para 8.27(i). In contrast to the position under HA 1996, Part 7 (as amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) set out at 10.117 fn 1, the Welsh Code advises that consideration of the physical condition of the property will always require an inspection of the property and an assessment in accordance with the Housing, Health and Safety Rating System.

10.119 The English Code also refers to ‘the physical characteristics of the accommodation’ being reasonable for the particular applicant (eg a wheelchair user) to continue to occupy 1. It is in this context that the public sector equality duty under Equality Act 2010, s 149 may become relevant. Where the applicant has a disability which is relevant to the question of whether accommodation is reasonable for his or her continued occupation, then the public sector equality duty will be engaged. In such circumstances the local housing authority will need to ‘focus very sharply’ on the matters relevant to the performance of this duty 2. In practice this is likely to require a similar approach to that which is required in assessing whether or not accommodation provided to a disabled person is suitable within the meaning of HA 1996, s 206 3.

1 English Code, para 6.39(a).
3 See London Borough of Hackney v Haque [2017] EWCA Civ 4, [2017] PTSR 769, CA per Briggs L at [43], Chatokai v Salford City Council (2017) July/August Legal Action, p 42, County Court at Manchester and 18.65–18.68.

10.120 Whether or not a property has adequate fire prevention and escape facilities, in comparison with other properties in the local housing authority’s district, is a relevant consideration 1. A vandalised property was, on the facts of a particular case, found to be not reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy 2. A damp beach chalet, which a pregnant applicant had been told would be unsafe for her baby, was held not to be reasonable to continue to occupy, given the clear medical advice\(^1\).

See also Bavi v Waltham Forest London Borough Council [2009] EWCA Civ 551, (2009) August Legal Action, p 37, CA, where the local housing authority had properly considered all the relevant defects, including rising dampness, and found that the applicant was not homeless, and Nagi v Birmingham City Council [2010] EWCA Civ 1391, (2011) January Legal Action, p 36, CA, where a local housing authority was not wrong in law to find that accommodation which had internal stairs and was accessed by a steep slope was reasonable to continue to be occupied by a couple where the wife had epilepsy and a mobility problem.

10.121 Local housing authorities are entitled to compare the physical conditions of the applicant’s accommodation with the general physical conditions of housing in their districts\(^1\).

OVERCROWDING

10.122 When considering the question of overcrowding, local housing authorities should consider all the different aspects of the statutory overcrowding test at Housing Act 1985, ss 324–326\(^1\). They must not limit themselves to whether the property is statutorily overcrowded, although that can be a key or contributing factor to their decision on reasonableness\(^2\). They should also consider any overcrowding that does not amount to statutory overcrowding, any medical needs and any other matters relevant to the impact of overcrowding\(^3\). The extent to which the accommodation may be a ‘hazard’, as defined by Housing Act 2004\(^4\), and the severity of that hazard, may also be relevant\(^5\).

1. Elrify v Westminster City Council [2007] EWCA Civ 332, [2007] HLR 36, CA. In Elmer v London Borough of Wandsworth [2016] EWCA Civ 1278, CA, the Court of Appeal refused the appellant permission to appeal against a decision that the local housing authority were not required to measure the dimensions of the rooms in the property to evaluate whether there had been statutory overcrowding, where that issue had not been raised on review.

2. English Code, para 6.27; Welsh Code, para 8.27(ii).

5. Khadija Ali v Bristol City Council (2007) October Legal Action, p 26, Bristol County Court; and see also Hashi v Birmingham City Council (2010) November Legal Action, p 19, Birmingham County Court, where there had been a total reliance or an over-reliance on the test of statutory overcrowding and a failure to give a rational explanation for rejecting independent advice that there was a Category 1 hazard.

10.123 Even when accommodation is statutorily overcrowded, a local housing authority may be entitled to find that it is reasonable to continue to occupy, taking into account the general housing circumstances prevailing in its district\(^1\). However, a decision that an overcrowded property was reasonable to continue to occupy because the overcrowding was a result of the increasing size of the applicant’s family was quashed. It was a value judgment that had no place in the statutory scheme. The reason for the overcrowding is simply not relevant to whether or not the property is reasonable to continue to occupy. A local housing authority is entitled to compare the degree of overcrowding with the general housing circumstances prevailing in its district, including the general degree of overcrowding in its district, but it should ensure that it addresses the particular degree of overcrowding experienced by the applicant. Merely asserting the general prevalence of overcrowding in the district without evidence showing the numbers of households experiencing a similar degree of overcrowding to that experienced by the applicant is not sufficient.

1. Harouki v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council [2007] EWCA Civ 1000, [2008] HLR 16, CA, where an applicant was statutorily overcrowded and thus committing an offence (Housing Act 1985, s 327). It should be noted that the extent to which the accommodation might constitute a ‘hazard’ within the meaning of the Housing Act 2004 was not considered.

Relationship breakdown

10.124 A local housing authority’s decision that it was reasonable for an ex-husband to occupy his former matrimonial home with his ex-wife and her new boyfriend, given the general housing circumstances prevailing in its district, was held not to contain errors of law. Although it was undesirable for a divorced couple to have to live together, the local housing authority was entitled to take into account the shortage of accommodation in its district.

Types of accommodation

10.125 Short-term crisis-type accommodation, such as women’s refuges, direct access hostels and night shelters should not be considered accommodation that is reasonable to continue to occupy in the medium and long term (assuming that such facilities are capable of constituting ‘accommodation’ at all).

1. English Code, para 6.39(b); Welsh Code, paras 8.26 and 8.27(iii)-8.28. The House of Lords, when considering the special position of women’s refuges in Ali & others v Birmingham City Council, Moran v Manchester City Council [2009] UKHL 36, [2009] 1 WLR 1506, HL, held that since refuges were not reasonable for women to continue to occupy indefinitely, they did not need to decide whether refuges were ‘accommodation’ within the meaning of HA 1996, s 175. See also 10.8–10.16.

10.126 The House of Lords has held that women’s refuges, in particular, should not be considered reasonable to continue to occupy indefinitely. Baroness Hale said:

‘... a refuge is not simply crisis intervention for a few nights. It is a safe haven in which to find peace and support. But it is not a place to live. There are rules which are necessary for the protection of residents but make it impossible to live a normal family life. It is a place to gather one’s strength and one’s thoughts and to decide what to do with one’s life’.

Tenure

10.127 Accommodation need not be subject to any security of tenure for it to be accommodation which is reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy. The mere fact that accommodation is temporary will not, in itself, render accommodation not reasonable to continue to occupy. If accommodation is so precarious that the occupier is likely to have to leave within 56 days then the applicant will in any event be threatened with homelessness.

Former members of the armed forces

10.128 Former members of the armed forces, who were provided with accommodation during their service, are likely to lose that accommodation upon discharge. The Ministry of Defence will usually issue a Certificate of Cessation of Entitlement to Occupy Service Living Accommodation, which contains a date on which entitlement to occupy service quarters will end. The Codes recommend that local housing authorities should accept the date in the Certificate as being the date upon which an applicant becomes homeless, and should not insist upon the Ministry of Defence obtaining possession orders. They add that the 6-month notice period before the date of cessation in the certificate can be used to ensure that service personnel receive advice on housing options available to them. If this advice does not result in the applicant obtaining alternative accommodation by the beginning of the 56-day period leading up to the date of cessation, the applicant will be threatened with homeless and will be entitled to have his or her application for homelessness assistance determined in accordance with HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

Harassment falling short of violence

10.129 Where there is harassment falling short of actual violence or threats of violence that are likely to be carried out, the English Code recommends that local housing authorities should ‘consider carefully’ the question of whether or not it would be reasonable for the applicant and his or her household to continue to occupy. Examples of verbal abuse, damage to property or the risk of intimidation of witnesses in criminal proceedings are given. In Wales, such harassment may constitute ‘abuse’.

2 English Code, para 6.39(c).
3 See 10.92–10.98.

Accommodation overseas

10.130 Where the applicant has accommodation available to him or her overseas, the question of whether it is reasonable to occupy the accommodation requires consideration of all relevant matters, including the affordability of the accommodation, its physical condition, etc. The local housing authority should not limit itself to the issue of the accommodation’s size and facilities. Any risk of violence to the applicant, the location of the accommodation, the applicant’s personal circumstances, financial circumstances and employment prospects are also relevant. The local housing authority will also need to consider the applicant’s Art 8 rights, the extent to which leaving the UK would interfere with his or her private or family life and whether that impact is proportionate. If the impact of the local housing authority’s decision would or might involve a child or children having to relocate to another country, the local housing authority must also consider whether relocating would be in the best interests of the child. Those best interests are to be given primacy.

10.131 When considering the location, physical characteristics, etc, of the accommodation abroad, the local housing authority is entitled to take into account the general circumstances prevailing in relation to housing in its own district. The comparison is not with general housing circumstances in the area in which the accommodation is located.

Accommodation obtained by deception

It will not be reasonable for an applicant to continue to occupy accommodation which has been obtained by deception. In Chishimba v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council the applicant, a Namibian national, had obtained accommodation under HA 1996, Pt 7 using a counterfeit passport. Her deception was later uncovered and a possession order was made against her. The local housing authority took the view that it would have been reasonable for her to continue to occupy the accommodation it had provided. This decision was upheld on review and on appeal. The Court of Appeal allowed a second appeal holding that it could not have been reasonable for her to occupy accommodation which she never had any lawful right to occupy.

R v Exeter City Council ex p Gliddon (1984) HLR 103, QBD, where the applicants had obtained accommodation by misleading their landlord about their income.

Other circumstances

It is impossible to set out and examine all of the many factors that may cause accommodation to be, or to have become, unreasonable for an applicant to continue to occupy. That is precisely why the local housing authority will have to examine carefully any matter raised by the applicant. Applicants may advance highly subjective reasons for not wanting to continue in occupation of a particular property. For example, a factor considered by the Court of Appeal in one case was the location of the accommodation in relation to the applicant’s place of employment. The question for the local housing authority is not ‘Would it be reasonable for this applicant to leave this property?’ but rather ‘Would it be reasonable for the applicant to continue in occupation?’ Even when faced with what might seem to be compelling personal objections to the applicant continuing to occupy accommodation, a local housing authority may be able to point to general housing conditions in its area to demonstrate that it would be reasonable for the applicant to stay on.

In R v Nottingham City Council ex p Costello (1989) 21 HLR 301, QBD, the issue was whether the accommodation was troubled by poltergeists (either actually or in the applicant’s belief) and therefore not reasonable to continue to occupy. In EC v Westminster City Council (2017) May Legal Action, p 43, County Court at Central London the issue (which the local housing authority had failed to properly consider) was whether the severe impact of a mother’s grief after her son had been killed in a hit-and-run accident outside the family home, meant that it was not reasonable for her to continue to occupy the property.

10.134 Homeless or Threatened with Homelessness

Reasonable for whom?

10.134 When a local housing authority is considering whether accommodation is ‘available’ for the applicant, HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 require it to consider availability for all others in the applicant’s household. In contrast, when considering the reasonableness of continued occupation, the focus is only on the reasonableness of the applicant continuing in occupation, and not on whether or not it is reasonable for his or her household to continue in occupation. HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 expressly address the others in the household for the purposes of deemed unreasonableness (violence, threats of violence or abuse), but not otherwise. However, this does not mean that, in cases not involving violence or abuse, the circumstances of the applicant’s household can be ignored. An applicant may very commonly assert that the factor causing the accommodation to be no longer reasonable for his or her occupation is the medical or other situation of a different member of his or her household. The phrase ‘reasonable for the person to continue to occupy’ is plainly broad enough to encompass such considerations. It follows that the local housing authority must make inquiries sufficient to determine whether, in view of those matters, the accommodation is not reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy.

The special position for applicants to local housing authorities in England re-applying within two years of acceptance of a private rented sector offer

10.135 As a result of the amendments to HA 1996, Pt 7, made by Localism Act 2011, ss 148–149, local housing authorities in England can make a ‘private rented sector offer’ to an applicant whose application for homelessness assistance was made on or after 9 November 2012 and who is owed the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty. If the private rented sector offer is suitable for the needs of the applicant and of his or her household, and if the applicant has been informed in writing of the matters set out at HA 1996, s 193(7AB), the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty will come to an end whether the applicant accepts or refuses the private rented sector offer.

2 For ‘main housing duty’, see 16.94–16.199.
3 HA 1996, s 193(7F), for suitability see Chapter 18.
4 HA 1996, s 193(7AA). See 16.153–16.179. It should be noted that the ‘private rented sector offer’ is not the only avenue by which a duty owed to an applicant for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England may be brought to an end by means of accommodation being secured for him or her in the private rented sector. In fact, the amendments to HA 1996, Pt 7 made by the HRA 2017 (for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) mean that discharge into the private sector offer could happen in other circumstances.

rented sector is likely to become more common. But the ‘private rented sector offer’ is the only such avenue which places the applicant in a more advantageous position if he or she re-applies for homelessness assistance within two years of accepting such an offer. See Chapter 16 for a full discussion of the various duties that may be owed to a homeless applicant and the various ways in which they may be brought to an end.

10.136 Where an applicant has accepted a private rented sector offer, and subsequently makes a fresh application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England within two years of the date of his or her acceptance of the offer, having been given a valid Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice, he or she will be deemed to be homeless at the date of expiry of the notice.

1 HA 1996, s 195A(1).

10.137 To obtain the benefit of this provision, the fresh application must be made within two years of the date of acceptance of the private rented sector offer, not the date when the tenancy is granted or when it actually began.

1 HA 1996, s 195A(2). Note, that as a result of the new HA 1996, s 175(5) (inserted by HRA 2017 s 1(3) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) any applicant who has been served with a valid HA 1988, s 21 notice will be deemed to be threatened with homelessness in the 56-day period preceding the expiry of the notice. See 10.112 and 10.144-10.147.

10.138 Providing he or she is eligible for assistance, the local housing authority will owe the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty, and must take reasonable steps to help the applicant to secure that suitable accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation. Those reasonable steps might include negotiating with the landlord for a further assured shorthold tenancy.

1 See Chapter 11.

2 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138-15.189.

10.139 However, if the performance of the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty does not result in suitable accommodation becoming available for the applicant’s occupation then, when the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty comes to an end, the local housing authority will have to secure alternative accommodation for the applicant and his or her household pursuant to the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty ‘regardless of whether the applicant has a priority need’.

1 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138-15.189.

2 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138-15.189.

3 HA 1996, s 195A(1).

10.140 For that reason, it is important not to delay the making of an application. If the applicant were to wait to make his or her application until after two years from the date of his or her acceptance of the private rented sector offer had elapsed, this special deeming provision would not apply.

1 The applicant will have been advised of the importance of making a further application within two years of the date of his or her acceptance of the private rented sector offer when the offer...

was first made (HA 1996, s 193(7AB)(c)). This notification provision does not apply to applicants who were restricted cases (HA 1996, s 193(7AB)(c)).

10.141 This special provision does not apply to applicants to whom the main housing duty at HA 1996, s 193(2) is only owed because of the presence in his or her household of a restricted person\(^1\). Applicants in those circumstances would have to be homeless applying the usual rules and also have a priority need in order to be owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty.

\(^{1}\) HA 1996, s 195A(5) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. For ‘restricted person’ see HA 1996, s 184(7) and 9.54–9.56, 9.126–9.130 and 11.163–11.164.

10.142 This special deeming provision only applies once. If an applicant in these circumstances accepts a further private rented sector offer and that accommodation subsequently comes to an end within two years of the date of that acceptance, the usual rules governing whether or not the applicant is homeless would apply and the applicant would need to have a priority need in order to be owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty\(^1\).

\(^{1}\) HA 1996, s 195A(6) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

10.143 In Wales the duty to secure accommodation under H(W)A 2014, s 75(1), may be brought to an end\(^2\) by acceptance of an offer of suitable accommodation under an assured tenancy (including an assured shorthold tenancy)\(^3\) or by rejection of a private rented sector offer\(^4\) as defined in H(W)A 2014, s 76(4). However, there is no equivalent deeming provision under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2. Applicants in Wales who accept an offer of an assured shorthold tenancy and are subsequently given a valid Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice, must, on later re-applications, satisfy the same conditions as any other applicant who applies to a local housing authority for help in retaining or obtaining accommodation.

\(^{1}\) See 17.158–17.197.

THREATENED WITH HOMELESSNESS

10.144 If it is likely that an applicant will become homeless (within the extended definition explained in this Chapter) within 56 days, that person is ‘threatened with homelessness’\(^1\). In practice, many homeless applicants are likely to be threatened with homelessness rather than being actually homeless when they first make their application to a local housing authority for accommodation or assistance in obtaining accommodation. The Codes advise that local housing authorities should not wait for homelessness to be imminent before providing assistance\(^2\).

\(^{1}\) HA 1996, s 175(4) as amended by HRA 2017, s 1(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, s 55(4).
Where a local housing authority has reason to believe that an applicant ‘may be threatened with homelessness’, it is subject to the duty to accept the application and either make inquiries (where the application is made to a local housing authority in England)\(^1\) or undertake an assessment (where the application is made to a local housing authority in Wales)\(^2\). If, upon concluding its inquiries or its assessment, the local housing authority decides that the applicant is eligible and threatened with homelessness then, irrespective of the personal circumstances of the applicant, a single duty arises to take reasonable steps to help to secure that accommodation does not cease to be available for the applicant's occupation\(^3\). Where the application is made to a local housing authority in England, a further duty will also be owed, to assess the applicant’s case and prepare a personalised housing plan\(^4\).

3 HA 1996, s 195(2) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, ss 65–66(1). See 15.87–15.137 (Engand) and 17.45–17.72 (Wales).
4 HA 1996, s 189A as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.62–15.86.

There is obviously a wide range of circumstances in which an applicant may face the prospect of homelessness within 56 days. One of the more common arises where an applicant has been served with a Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice. An applicant for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England who has been served with a valid Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice will be deemed to be threatened with homelessness throughout the 56-day period leading up to the expiry of the notice\(^1\). Another common scenario is where an applicant has been informed that a court has issued a warrant for his or her eviction and there are fewer than 56 days left before the date scheduled for execution of the warrant\(^2\). If an applicant in these circumstances is not already homeless, he or she will be threatened with homelessness\(^3\).

1 HA 1996, s 175(5), as inserted by HRA 2017, s 1(3) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 10.112.
3 See 10.110–11.116 for further discussion of the effect of imminent or actual possession proceedings.

Prior to the coming into force of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 and the amendments to HA 1996, Pt 7 introduced by HRA 2017\(^4\), a person would have been regarded as being threatened with homelessness where it was likely that he or she would become homeless within 28 days\(^5\). The duty owed to such a person would vary according to whether he or she had a priority need\(^6\) and whether he or she had become threatened with homelessness intentionally\(^7\). The extension of the time period during which a person is to be regarded as threatened with homelessness and the widening of the scope of the duty owed to such applicants denote a clear policy shift in both England and Wales, placing a greater emphasis on ‘prevention’\(^8\), ie assisting applicants at an early stage\(^9\), and increasing the help available to those who would previously have received only limited assistance, with the intention that fewer households should experience the trauma of homelessness.

INTRODUCTION

Overview

11.1 Not everyone qualifies for help from a local housing authority under the homelessness provisions. There is an ‘eligibility’ test and, because of that, one of the first inquiries that a local housing authority must make of an applicant for assistance is whether he or she is eligible to obtain any help at all.1

1 Housing Act 1996, s 184(1)(a); Housing (Wales) Act 2014, s 62(4).

11.2 As this chapter will demonstrate, ‘eligibility’ normally (but not exclusively) depends on the immigration status of the person seeking assistance. For this reason, both those who advise the homeless, and the staff who receive and determine their applications, need a familiarity with the homelessness eligibility rules set out here, and also with the basic rules of UK immigration control. Self-evidently, a system which discriminates between potential service-users on the basis of nationality may lay itself open to a complaint of discrimination. Not surprisingly, the impact of the anti-discrimination provisions of the Human Rights Act, Sch 1, Art 14 on the eligibility test has already been explored in the courts.2

11.3 The normal rule is that anyone is able to apply for help to any local housing authority, whatever his or her connection with the district of that particular local housing authority (or even if he or she has no connection with the UK at all). When the homelessness safety net was first brought into law by the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, it contained no eligibility test at all. Anyone from anywhere could apply. It was left to the courts to identify the first ineligible categories: those who had entered the country unlawfully and those who, having entered lawfully, remained unlawfully in the UK.

11.4 But nowadays the modern statutory regime contains sophisticated exclusion provisions. The general rule, that homelessness assistance is available to all, is preserved. However, the Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996), Pt 7, at ss 185 and 186, and Housing (Wales) Act 2014 (H(W)A 2014), Pt 2, at s 61 and Sch 2, provide for the exclusion of specific categories of applicants. As a result, eligibility is defined in the negative. A person is not excluded from homelessness assistance unless caught by the provisions of either HA 1996, s 185 or s 186 or H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, paras 1 and 2.

1 HA 1996, s 183(2); H(W)A 2014, s 99.

11.5 The largest excluded group comprises those rendered ineligible either by HA 1996, s 185, or by H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1, which both contain two categories of ‘persons from abroad’. They are:

(1) ‘persons subject to immigration control’; and
(2) ‘other persons from abroad’.

11.6 Anyone falling within the first category will be excluded from homelessness assistance, unless he or she is within one of the classes of persons prescribed as eligible by regulations. Anyone falling within the second category will be excluded from homelessness assistance if he or she is not habitually resident, unless he or she falls within one of the groups of people prescribed as exempt from the habitual residence test, or falls within the two other classes of ‘people’ prescribed as excluded by the regulations.

2 See 11.130–11.136.

3 See 11.137–11.40.

11.7 Though there are separate regulations governing eligibility for homelessness assistance in England and Wales respectively, the classes of eligible person contained within those regulations are identical. But this has not always been the case. In England, the current relevant regulations apply to applications for homelessness assistance made on or after 1 June 2006. In Wales, the current regulations apply to applications made on or after 31 October 2014. For applications to local housing authorities made before 1 June 2006 (England) or 31 October 2014 (Wales), the relevant regulations were considered in previous editions of this book.

1 SI 2006/1294, reg 8.
2 SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 8.

11.8 Often the most difficult question to answer in determining whether an applicant is eligible for homelessness assistance is whether he or she is subject to immigration control. This is the linchpin of eligibility, since it is necessary to answer this question in order to determine whether the applicant falls into either of the two categories of ‘persons from abroad’ rendered ineligible by HA 1996, s 185, or by H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1, and if so which one. This difficulty can be particularly acute in instances where the applicant may have a right to reside as, or deriving from, an EEA national. The law relating to the eligibility of EEA nationals is particularly complex and requires understanding not only of the Regulations made under HA 1996, s 185(2) and (3) and H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, paras 1(2) and (4), but also of the immigration status of EEA nationals and their family members. With that in mind, the remainder of this chapter is structured as follows:

- first, we will consider who is, and is not, a person subject to immigration control (including a discussion of the various EEA rights of residence);
- second, we will go on to discuss the rules that must then be applied to determine whether an applicant is eligible;
- third, we will review the further, self-contained, sets of rules that must be applied in those cases where the applicant has an ineligible household member, or where the application for homelessness assistance is made to a local housing authority in the Isles of Scilly.

1 It is to be expected that the law relating to the rights of EEA nationals to reside in the UK and the rules governing their eligibility for homelessness assistance will change significantly following Brexit. What these changes may be and when they may come into effect are, at the time of writing, a matter of speculation. This chapter states the law currently in force.

2 See 11.26–11.93.
3 See 11.94–11.172.

11.9 The other provisions relating to eligibility, HA 1996, s 186 and H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 2, catch the ever-diminishing number of pre-April 2000 asylum seekers who are eligible for homelessness assistance. The provisions will be repealed when the last of those cases passes through the asylum system. At the date of writing the fifth edition of this book, any applicant who fell within these provisions would have made his or her application for homelessness assistance over 17 years previously. This edition does not contain commentary on these provisions. Readers who might still need that commentary are referred to the first or second editions of this book.

1 Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, ss 117(5), 169(3) and Sch 16; H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 2(1).
11.9 Eligibility for Assistance

Eligible for what?

11.10 Applicants seeking homelessness assistance from local housing authorities in England who are not eligible are excluded from almost all the forms of assistance available under HA 1996, Pt 7 as amended by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017). This is because HA 1996, Pt 7 defines ‘assistance’ to mean:

‘...the benefit of any function under the following provisions of this Part relating to accommodation or assistance in obtaining accommodation.’

Someone who is not eligible will not be entitled to assistance under any of the duties or powers set out from HA 1996, s 188 onwards.

1 HA 1995, s 185(1).
3 HA 1996, s 183(3).
4 As amended by HRA 2017, s 5(4), for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

11.11 Applicants seeking homelessness assistance from local housing authorities in Wales who are not eligible are expressly excluded from the duties at H(W)A 2014, ss 66, 68, 73 and 75 only. Functionally, this is very similar to the position faced by applicants in England. In Wales, such applicants will be excluded from the majority of forms of assistance under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

2 H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(1).
3 The distinction is that these applicants are still, notionally, entitled to seek interim accommodation pending review under H(W)A 2014, s 69(11), which finds its counterpart in HA 1996, s 188(3). It seems unlikely that the distinction will have any practical impact. The power to provide accommodation pending review is discretionary and in circumstances where there is no dispute that the applicant for homelessness assistance is not eligible, it seems inconceivable that this discretion would be exercised in his or her favour.

11.12 Applicants for homelessness assistance in either England or Wales who are not eligible, will still be able to obtain advice and information about homelessness (and about the prevention of homelessness) from the local housing authority, free of charge.

1 HA 1996, ss 179(1), as amended by HRA 2017, s 2, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, and 183(3); H(W)A 2014, ss 60(1), 61 and Sch 2, para 1(1). See Chapter 8 and 8.4–8.11. The Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities (Ministry of Housing, Communities and Local Government, 2018) (the English Code), para 14.32 suggests that ‘where an applicant is found not to be eligible for assistance, the housing authority must provide, or secure the provision, of information and advice as set out in section 179’. See further Chapter 20 for other help which may be available to an ineligible applicant from his or her local authority.

11.13 This very wide definition of the exclusion from assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 makes it all the more important that the provisions of HA 1996, s 185 and H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1 (and the regulations made under them) are looked at very carefully to ensure that only those whom HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 define as ineligible are in fact excluded.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

11.14 Because eligibility is linked to immigration status, which can change, it is possible for an applicant’s eligibility also to change.

11.15 The first crucial date for determining eligibility is the date on which the local housing authority reaches its decision as to whether the applicant is ‘eligible’¹. If there is then a review of that decision, the critical date becomes the date of the review decision². It would be maladministration and unlawful for a local housing authority deliberately to delay its inquiries in the hope that an applicant’s eligibility might change³, although it may be sensible in particular circumstances to delay a determination of eligibility if a decision of the immigration authorities is a matter of hours or days away. If, at the first crucial date, the applicant is ‘eligible’, then the appropriate service under HA 1996, Pt 7⁴ or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 must be provided.

1 Unless the applicant has applied for homelessness assistance before 1 June 2006 (local housing authorities in England) or 31 October 2014 (local housing authorities in Wales), in which case transitional provisions state that his or her eligibility will be determined by the relevant Regulations in force at the date of his or her application (Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006, SI 2006/1294, reg 8; Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014, SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 8.

4 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

11.16 The second crucial date is the date on which the applicant’s immigration status changes. The consequences of a change in immigration status (which vary according to whether the application for homelessness assistance is made in England or Wales and which duty is owed at the time) are as follows:

• if the applicant is owed the HA 1996, s 195(2)¹ or H(W)A 2014, s 66² prevention duty then that duty will end upon the applicant being given notice that the local housing authority is satisfied that he or she is no longer eligible for assistance¹;

• if the applicant is owed the HA 1996, s 188(1)⁴ or H(W)A 2014, s 68¹ interim accommodation duty then that duty will end upon the applicant being given notice that the local housing authority is satisfied that he or she is no longer eligible for assistance⁴;
11.16 Eligibility for Assistance

- if the applicant is owed the HA 1996, s 189B(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 73 relief duty then that duty will end upon the applicant being given notice that the local housing authority is satisfied that he or she is no longer eligible for assistance;
- if the applicant is owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 75 main housing duty then that duty will end upon the applicant ceasing to be eligible for assistance (England) or being given notice that the local housing authority is satisfied that he or she is no longer eligible for assistance (Wales);
- if the applicant is owed the HA 1996, s 190(2) short-term accommodation duty then the fact that the applicant is no longer eligible for assistance will be of no effect;
- if the applicant is owed the HA 1996, s 193C(4) accommodation duty, owed to applicants who have deliberately and unreasonably refused to co-operate, then that duty will end upon the applicant ceasing to be eligible for assistance;
- if the homeless applicant has passed through HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 into longer-term social housing allocated under HA 1996, Pt 6, or has accepted an offer of accommodation in the private sector which brought the duty owed to him or her to an end, the change in eligibility does not impact directly on his or her status as a tenant. However, the underlying change in the person’s immigration status which led to the change in his or her eligibility may well have a knock on effect on his or her legal right to maintain any tenancy.

Presumably this reflects the practical reality that this is a short-term duty which would have come to an end after a reasonable period, in any event.

As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

The Immigration Act 2014, Pt 3 places significant restrictions on the rights of certain nationals from outside of the EEA and Switzerland to rent accommodation in the UK in the private sector. Under the Immigration Act 2014, ss 20–28 a landlord who rents premises to an individual who is disqualified as a result of his or her immigration status from occupying premises under a residential tenancy agreement may be required to pay a financial penalty. This includes the situation where a person becomes disqualified as a result of a change in his or her immigration status during the course of their tenancy: Immigration Act 2014, s 22(5).

As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

11.17 In either England or Wales, if an applicant who is being helped or accommodated under HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, becomes ineligible owing to a change in his or her immigration status, this does not mean that he or she is instantly put out onto the streets. The expectation is that public authorities will behave reasonably which (in this context) means that accommodation provision should at least be continued for such time as gives the applicant a fair chance to find somewhere else to live.

As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

11.18 Where an ineligible applicant (or an applicant who becomes ineligible) has children under the age of 18 (or is himself or herself a child), the local housing authority should make arrangements to refer the applicant’s case to the relevant children’s services authority or department, so that they can consider the exercise of their statutory duties and powers to protect children.

HA 1996, s 213A as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(7) for applications for homelessness assistance made on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, s 96. See also R (Badu) v Lambeth London Borough Council [2005] EWCA Civ 1184, [2006] HLR 8, CA, and Chapter 20 for the range of statutory powers and duties available to children’s services authorities.

11.19 Any applicant who is found to be ineligible for homelessness assistance may re-apply for homelessness assistance if his or her circumstances change such that he or she may have become eligible again.

Local housing authorities in England must accept fresh applications where there are ‘new facts’ that are not merely fanciful or trivial (Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council [2003] EWCA Civ 340, [2005] HLR 34, CA; and R (May) v Birmingham City Council [2012] EWHC 1399 (Admin), (2012) July Legal Action, p 41, Admin Ct). See 8.78–8.83 and English Code, paras 18.11–18.13. Local housing authorities in Wales must accept fresh applications where there has been a material change in the applicant’s circumstances or where there is new information that would affect the local housing authority’s previous assessment: H(W)A 2014, s 62(1) and (2). See 8.84 and Code of Guidance for Local Authorities on the Allocation of Accommodation and Homelessness (Welsh Government, March 2016) (the Welsh Code), paras 10.10–10.12.
11.20 Eligibility for Assistance

Whose eligibility?

11.20 The eligibility test is primarily directed to working out whether the applicant is eligible for, or excluded from, homelessness services. If the applicant is found not to be eligible, that will (subject to any review or appeal) be an end to his or her attempt to obtain homelessness services, even if other members of his or her household are plainly eligible for such services. The proper course in that situation is for the other household member(s) to apply to the local housing authority on behalf of the household. However, where the applicant is eligible but a member of his or her household is not, then the special rules on disregarding ineligible household members or the rules on restricted persons may apply.

1 Any accommodation duty owed to the new applicant will extend to accommodating everyone else who falls within the definition of ‘household’ at HA 1996, s 176 and H(W)A 2014, s 56 (see 10.21–10.32).

Making inquiries into eligibility

11.21 To work out whether either of the two statutory exclusion provisions (either at HA 1996, ss 185 and 186 or H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, paras 1 and 2) apply, it is first necessary to know something of the nationality and immigration status of the applicant. Inquiries need to be made sensitively and without applying any form of discriminatory approach as between different applicants.

1 For a general discussion on the duty to make inquiries see Chapter 9.
2 English Code, para 7.4; Welsh Code, para 7.3.

11.22 Detailed discussion of an applicant’s immigration status is outside the scope of this book, but some guidance in this complex area is provided at Chapter 7 and Annex 1 of the English Code and Chapter 7 and Annexes 4–6 of the Welsh Code.

11.23 The resolution of any uncertainty about an applicant’s immigration or asylum status, or about the relevant dates (eg of entry into the UK or application for asylum) may require the help of the Home Office. Local housing authorities are advised to contact the Home Office if there is any uncertainty arising from an application. The Welsh Code recommends that the applicant is informed that an inquiry will be made before doing so. This allows the applicant an opportunity to withdraw his or her application for homelessness assistance if she or he does not want such an inquiry to be made.

1 Contact details can be found at Welsh Code, Annex 5.
2 English Code, para 7.11; Welsh Code, para 7.13.
3 Welsh Code, para 7.15.

11.24 The Home Office is required to provide local housing authorities, on request, with information about whether a person falls within any particular statutory category (eg within Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, s 115) or any other information required to enable local housing authorities to determine whether applicants are eligible for assistance. Most requests for information are made, and the responses to them given, by telephone. Having regard to the complexity of the subject matter and the importance of accuracy, it may be sensible for a local housing authority receiving complex information from the Home Office (particularly if it is going to be used to make or support an adverse eligibility decision) to ask that the Home Office provide the information in writing. The Home Office need not provide written confirmation unless the request itself is in writing. A local housing authority is entitled to rely on the Home Office’s view of an applicant’s current immigration status, and need not make inquiries as to, for example, the possible outcome of a pending appeal. The Home Office may advise on an applicant’s immigration status, but the decision on eligibility is for the local housing authority itself.

1 Which excludes ‘persons subject to immigration control’ from housing benefit and is referred to at HA 1996, s 185(2A) and H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(3).
2 HA 1996, s 187(1) and (2); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, paras 3(1) and (2).
3 HA 1996, s 187(2); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 3(2).

11.25 If the Home Office does provide information to a local housing authority, it is then under a continuing obligation to notify that local housing authority, in writing, if there are any subsequent applications, decisions or other changes of circumstance affecting the particular applicant’s status. This continuing obligation is obviously of crucial importance if the applicant’s immigration status is under review (or awaiting an initial decision or subject to an appeal) when the local housing authority makes its first request for information.

1 HA 1996, s 187(3); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 3(3). From the wording, it appears that the Home Office is obliged to notify these changes of circumstances in writing, whether or not the information originally provided was provided in writing or verbally.

WHO IS, AND IS NOT, SUBJECT TO IMMIGRATION CONTROL?

Overview

11.26 The starting point is the special meaning of ‘subject to immigration control’. It means ‘a person who is subject to immigration control within the meaning of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996’1. The Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 itself states:

‘... “person subject to immigration control” means a person who under the 1971 Act requires leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom (whether or not such leave has been given)”.

For these purposes, it is important to emphasise that a person (usually an EEA national or a person claiming to exercise rights derived from an EEA national) who does not require leave to enter but who does require leave to remain, is a person subject to immigration control. It is only a person who requires neither leave to enter nor leave to remain who is not subject to immigration control.

11.26 Eligibility for Assistance

Borough Council [2008] EWCA Civ 1074, [2008] All ER (D) 104 (May), CA, where a child born in the UK, without British Citizenship, to a Nigerian mother was found to be subject to immigration control: although he was not required to apply for leave to remain in order to stay in the country, had he left the country and sought to return he would have required leave to enter. The Court of Appeal, at [25] endorsed a concession made on the part of the Appellant that the expression ‘person from abroad’ refers to a person who is ineligible for assistance under HA 1996, s 185(2)-(4): ‘such a person may have physically come to this country from a foreign country. However, he need not necessarily have done so.’ See further Ismail v Newham London Borough Council [2018] EWCA Civ 665, CA: another case concerning a child born in the UK.

11.27 Tracing that route back to the Immigration Act 1971 reveals that:

- British citizens;
- Commonwealth citizens with the right of abode in the UK;
- European Economic Area (EEA) nationals and Swiss nationals exercising certain Treaty rights (see Box 2 at 11.29);
- people exercising rights derived from EEA or Swiss nationals exercising certain Treaty rights;
- certain people who are exempt from immigration control under the Immigration Acts (diplomats and their family members based in the UK, and some military personnel); and
- Irish citizens with a Common Travel Area entitlement,

do not require leave to enter or remain in the UK and therefore cannot be ‘persons subject to immigration control’.

2 Immigration Act 1988, s 7; Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, regs 13–15 at Appendix 2. From 1 June 2002, Swiss nationals have had the same rights to freedom of movement and social security within the EEA as EEA nationals and so Swiss nationals fall within the definition of EEA nationals at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, reg 2. All references to ‘EEA nationals’ in this book include Swiss nationals.
4 See Box 1. In the case of McCarthy v Brent London Borough Council [2016] November Legal Action, p 41, County Court at Central London the local housing authority unsuccessfully sought to persuade the court that Irish Citizens with a Common Travel Area entitlement were subject to immigration control.

It is to be expected that the law relating to the rights of EEA nationals to reside in the UK will change significantly following Brexit. What these changes may be and when they may come into effect are, at the time of writing, a matter of speculation. This chapter states the law currently in force.

11.29 Box 2 shows which countries are members of the European Union (EU) and/or members of the wider European Economic Area (EEA). For these purposes, nationals of Iceland, Liechtenstein, Norway, and Switzerland have the same rights to enter or reside as nationals of most of the EU Member States. Rights for nationals of Croatia are slightly different from those enjoyed by nationals of other EEA states. We refer throughout this chapter to nationals of EEA Member States, by which we mean all the EU Member States, plus the three additional EEA Member States and Switzerland.

Box 2

The European Union (EU):

Member States: Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden and the UK.

The European Economic Area (EEA):

All EU States plus Iceland, Liechtenstein and Norway.

Switzerland is not part of the EEA, but its nationals are treated as EEA nationals for these purposes.5

---

1 Croatia acceded to the EU on 1 July 2013. Albania, Montenegro, Serbia, Turkey and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia are ‘candidate countries’ for accession to the EU. Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Kosovo are potential ‘candidate countries’. See www.europa.eu/about-eu/countries/index_en.htm for an up-to-date list. The UK is expected to leave the EU in due course.
11.29 Eligibility for Assistance

2 Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052. See Appendix 2 of this book.
3 See 11.88–11.92.
4 The nationals of new member states are typically treated differently upon accession to the EU. Rights for nationals of the eight 2004 Accession States (‘A8 states’) were initially subject to derogation between 1 May 2004 and 30 April 2009 (Accession (Immigration and Worker Registration) Regulations 2004, SI 2004/1219). This period was subsequently extended to 30 April 2011 (Accession (Immigration and Worker Registration) (Amendment) Regulations 2009, SI 2009/892). This extension was recently held to be unlawful by the Court of Appeal in Secretary of State for Work and Pensions v Gubeladze [2017] EWCA Civ 1751, CA. The nature and extent of the practical ramifications of this decision remain to be seen. But, in any event, from 1 May 2011 nationals of the A8 member states have been treated in the same way as nationals of any other EEA member state, save that retained worker status is slightly different. The A8 states were the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Slovakia and Slovenia. Rights for nationals of the two 2007 Accession States (‘A2 states’) were subject to derogation between 1 January 2007 and 31 December 2013 (Accession (Immigration and Worker Registration) Regulations 2006, SI 2006/3317). From 1 January 2014 nationals of the A2 member states have been treated in the same way as nationals of any other EEA member state, save that retained worker status is slightly different. The A2 states were Romania and Bulgaria. Rights for Croatian nationals have been subject to derogation since 1 July 2013. After 30 June 2018, Croatian nationals are to be treated in the same way as other EEA nationals. See 111.88–11.92.
5 The Channel Islands, Isle of Man and Gibraltar are not part of the EEA but are within the EU.
6 Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, reg 2.

11.30 Obviously, the lists given in these boxes will fluctuate from time to time. The most up-to-date list is at Annex 4 of the Welsh Code.

11.31 In some instances it will be easy to establish whether an individual falls within the list at 11.29. For example, it will often be fairly easy to establish whether an individual has British citizenship, from which it can then be concluded that he or she is not subject to immigration control. Difficulties tend to arise in cases involving EEA nationals. In these cases it is not sufficient to inquire whether the individual has citizenship of a country within the EEA in order to determine whether he or she is subject to immigration control. In addition to that inquiry, it will be necessary to establish whether he or she is exercising EU Treaty rights, or has derived a right to reside from another person who is exercising his or her EU Treaty rights. Answering these questions is rarely straightforward. For that reason, the remainder of this part of the chapter will be given over to discussing the various rights to reside available to EEA nationals and their family members.

1 See 11.32–11.93.

Rights to reside for EEA nationals and their family members

11.32 The principal rights of residence are those recognised in domestic law by the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, regs 13–16. Those regulations are derived from the Freedom of Movement in the European Union Directive. The Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) has held that European Union Treaties and Regulations can confer rights of residence directly, whether or not those rights are specifically found in domestic law. The specific rights that the CJEU has recognised in recent years have been given effect in domestic legislation, to some extent in Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, reg 16 which contains the concept of 'derivative rights'. However, the principle remains that EU Treaties and EU Regulations can confer rights of residence directly and there may be other rights of residence which have not yet been considered by legislators or by the CJEU. Nationals of EEA member states who have never exercised any right of freedom of movement under EU Treaty rights are not beneficiaries of rights of free movement under EU Directive 2004/38/EC.

5. See 11.93.

11.33 The Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016 confer four rights of residence:

• an initial right of residence;
• an extended right of residence;
• a permanent right of residence; and
• a derivative right of residence.

11.34 Each will be examined in turn. Rights of residence will be most readily apparent where the person has a registration certificate or residence card issued by the Secretary of State. However, the registration certificate or residence card is simply confirmation of the person’s right, rather than the conferring of a right to reside. Where there is no residence certificate or residence card, local housing authorities will have to decide for themselves whether someone has a right of residence under EU law.

1. Secretary of State for Work and Pensions v Dias [2011] C-325/09, [2011] 3 CMLR 1103, CJEU. Indeed, the registration certificate or residence card will only prove the holder’s right of residence at the date of issue of the document, SI 2016/1052, regs 17(8) and 18(7).

The ‘initial right of residence’

11.35 Regulation 13 of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016 gives all EEA nationals and their family members an initial right of residence in the UK for a period not exceeding three months, upon condition that each person has a valid identity card issued by an EEA member state or a valid passport.

2. SI 2016/1052.
11.35 Eligibility for Assistance

3 Including ‘family member who has retained the right of residence’. ‘Family member’ is defined at SI 2016/1052, reg 7 and ‘family member who has retained the right of residence’ at SI 2016/1052, reg 10. See 11.54–11.60.

11.36 There is an exception where the Secretary of State has decided that a person’s removal is justified for the purposes of public policy, public security or public health, where the person has become an unreasonable burden on the social assistance system of the UK or where the person has misused his or her right to reside.

1 SI 2016/1052, reg 13(3) and (4).

The ‘extended right of residence’

11.37 ‘Qualified persons’ and their family members1, including family members who have retained the right of residence2, are entitled to an ‘extended right of residence’ in the UK for so long as they remain qualified persons and/or family members of qualified persons.3

1 As defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, reg 7. See 11.54–11.60.
2 As defined at SI 2016/1052, reg 10. See 11.60.
3 SI 2016/1052, reg 14. The rules on eligibility for individuals with this right of residence are set out at 12.122–11.140.

11.38 ‘Qualified person’ is defined at reg 6 of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 20161 as being a person who is an EEA national and, in the UK, is:

• a job-seeker; or
• a worker; or
• a self-employed person; or
• a self-sufficient person; or
• a student.

Each of these concepts will now be explored in turn.

1 SI 2016/1052.
3 Defined at SI 2016/1052, regs 4(1)(a) and 6(2)–(3). See 11.40–11.46.
4 Defined at SI 2016/1052, regs 4(1)(b) and 6(4). See 11.47–11.49.

‘Job-seeker’

11.39 A ‘job-seeker’4 is defined as ‘a person who enters the UK in order to seek employment and can provide evidence that he is seeking employment and has a genuine chance of being engaged’5.

1 Defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, reg 6(1).
2 SI 2016/1052, reg 6(1) and (5)–(7). See English Code, para 7.14(b).
‘Worker’

11.40 In order to qualify as a ‘worker’\(^1\) under this provision, the person must first be a national of an EEA Member State\(^2\). The term ‘worker’ is not defined in HA 1996, Pt 7\(^3\) or regulations and nor is it exhaustively defined in EU legislation. The CJEU has emphasised that a narrow approach should not be taken:

‘[I]t is settled case law that the concept of worker has a specific Community meaning and must not be interpreted narrowly. It must be defined in accordance with objective criteria which distinguish an employment relationship by reference to the rights and duties of the person concerned. In order to be treated as a worker, a person must pursue an activity which is genuine and effective, to the exclusion of activities on such a small scale as to be regarded as purely marginal and ancillary. The essential feature of an employment relationship is that for a certain period of time a person performs services for and under the direction of another person in return for which he receives remuneration. By contrast, neither the \textit{sui generis} nature of the employment relationship under national law, nor the level of productivity of the person concerned, the origin of the funds from which the remuneration is paid or the limited amount of the remuneration can have any consequence in regard to whether the person is a worker for the purposes of Community law . . . .\(^4\).’

\(^1\) Defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, regs 4(1)(a) and 6(2)–(3).

\(^2\) See Box 2 at 11.29.

\(^3\) As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

11.41 A person will be a worker if he or she is actually working in the UK, whether full- or part-time. Any genuine and effective work should count, so long as it is not so irregular and/or so limited that it is a purely marginal and ancillary activity\(^5\).

11.42 A person will retain the status of a worker for the purposes of these regulations\(^6\) if he or she:

- has worked in the UK (at any time and even for a short period) but has become temporarily incapable of work as a result of an illness or accident\(^7\); or
- has worked in the UK for one year or more before becoming involuntarily unemployed, is registered as a jobseeker and either has been unemployed for no more than six months or can provide ‘compelling evidence’ that he or she is continuing to seek employment and has a genuine chance of being engaged\(^8\); or
- has worked in the UK for less than one year before becoming involuntarily unemployed and is registered as a jobseeker and has been unemployed for no more than six months\(^9\); or
- has worked in the UK (at any time and even for a short period), but has become involuntarily unemployed and has embarked on vocational training\(^10\); or

\(^7\) \cite{Levin 53/81 [1982] ECR 1035; Kempf Case 139/85 [1986] ECR 1741; Raulin Case C-357/89 [1992] ECR 1027}.

\(^8\) \cite{Levin 53/81 [1982] ECR 1035; Kempf Case 139/85 [1986] ECR 1741; Raulin Case C-357/89 [1992] ECR 1027}.

11.43 Eligibility for Assistance

- has worked in the UK (at any time and even for a short period) and voluntarily given up work in the UK to take up vocational training related to his or her previous job⁶.

1 Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, reg 6(2) based on Scrivner Case 122/84 [1985] ECR 1027. Note that A8 workers requiring registration who had not completed 12 months’ registered employment before 1 May 2011 do not retain worker status under this regulation on account of work done before that date. Any work which he or she does after 1 May 2011 will count for these purposes (SI 2016/1052, Sch 4, para 2). The same rule applies with the necessary changes made, to A2 nationals who had not completed 12 months’ registered employment before 1 June 2014 (SI 2016/1052, Sch 4, para 2). Note also that this extended definition of ‘worker’ does not apply where a person is claiming a derivative right of residence, derived from his or her parent being a worker (SI 2016/1052, reg 16(7)(b) (see 11.76–11.79)).

2 SI 2016/1052, reg 6(2)(a).

3 SI 2016/1052, reg 6(2)(b) and (7).

4 SI 2016/1052, reg 6(2)(c) and (3).

11.44 Attempts to argue that people who have never worked in the UK are, nevertheless, ‘workers’ for the purpose of entitlement to job-seeker’s allowance and Children Act assistance have failed¹. A job-seeker who has never worked is not, therefore, a ‘worker’. Students and au pairs, working part-time, have been held by the Court of Appeal and the CJEU to be ‘workers’².

1 See 11.47–11.49 for ‘self-employed persons’.

11.45 The question as to whether an applicant is or is not a worker, is a question of fact for the local housing authority. In R (Mohamed) v Harrow London Borough Council², it was held that the local housing authority had not made any errors of law in concluding that a woman who had worked part-time for three months, finishing a year before her application for homelessness assistance, spoke little or no English, had two small children to look after and had not registered with an employment agency was not and had not retained the status of being a ‘worker’. In Barry v Southwark London Borough Council², the local housing authority was wrong to decide that an applicant was not a ‘worker’ during a two-week period when he was employed... by Group 4 Securicor for stewarding duties at the Wimbledon All England Tennis Championships. The work done was of economic value, there were PAYE deductions from his pay and the services provided by him to his employer were real and actual, and not merely marginal and ancillary. In another case of a part-time worker earning a low income, the local housing authority made an error of law when it applied a test of whether the work produced enough income to cover ‘reasonable living expenses’. The question of whether work is ‘effective’ is to be looked at from the view of the value of the work to the employer and not to the employee.

11.46 Expanding the definition of worker, the CJEU has held that a woman who gives up work because of the physical constraints of pregnancy and the aftermath of childbirth will retain her status as a ‘worker’, providing she is able to return to work or find another job within a reasonable period after the birth of her child.

‘SELF-EMPLOYED PERSON’

11.47 A ‘self-employed person’ is defined as ‘a person who establishes himself in order to pursue activity as a self-employed person in accordance with Art 49 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union’. Article 49 refers to ‘freedom of establishment’, which is itself defined as ‘the right to take up and pursue activities as self-employed persons and to set up and manage undertakings’. Self-employment is not confined to periods of actual work; a person remains self-employed if he or she is engaged on administrative, marketing or other tasks required to run or promote his or her business.

1. Defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, regs 4(1)(b) and 6(4).

11.48 In considering who is, and is not, a self-employed person the CJEU has an analagous approach to that which has been taken in respect of workers:

‘According to settled case law, the pursuit of an activity as an employed person or the provision of services for remuneration must be regarded as an economic activity within the meaning of Art. 2 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Art. 2 EC), provided that the work performed is genuine and effective and not such as to be regarded as purely marginal and ancillary.

Since the essential characteristic of an employment relationship within the meaning of Art. 48 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, Art.39 EC) is the fact that for
11.48 Eligibility for Assistance

A certain period of time a person performs services for and under the direction of another person in return for which he receives remuneration, any activity which a person performs outside a relationship of subordination must be classified as an activity pursued in a self-employed capacity for the purposes of Art.52 of the Treaty.\(^1\)

\(^1\) See 11.40–11.46 for ‘workers’.

11.49 A person remains a self-employed person if he or she is temporarily unable to pursue his or her self-employment activity as a result of illness or accident\(^1\). But the Court of Appeal has held, in relation to both self-employed persons and workers, that if someone’s illness means that he or she is unlikely to be able to work in the foreseeable future, then there are no realistic prospects of him or her being able to return to work and he or she is no longer a worker or a self-employed person\(^2\). A person will also retain his or her self-employed status where he or she has been compelled, because of an absence of work owing to circumstances beyond his or her control, to register as a jobseeker with the relevant employment office, having previously been self-employed for more than one year\(^3\).

\(^1\) SI 2016/1052, reg 6(4).

\(^3\) Gusa v Minister for Social Protection C-442/16, CJEU.

‘Self-sufficient person’

11.50 A ‘self-sufficient person’\(^1\) is defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016\(^2\), reg 4(1)(c) as a person who has:

- sufficient resources not to become a burden on the social assistance system of the UK during his or her period of residence; and
- comprehensive sickness insurance cover in the UK.

\(^1\) Defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, reg 4(1)(c).

\(^2\) SI 2016/1052.

11.51 The person’s resources must be sufficient to ensure that his or her family members\(^1\) also do not become a burden on the UK’s social assistance system\(^2\). This does not mean that the person, or his or her family member, cannot have any recourse at all to the social assistance system on the UK. EU law has made it clear that the test is:

‘as long as the beneficiaries of the right of residence do not become an unreasonable burden on the social assistance system of the host Member State they should not be expelled . . . The host Member State should examine whether it is a case of temporary difficulties and take into account the duration of residence, the personal circumstances and the amount of aid granted in order to consider whether the beneficiary has become an unreasonable burden on its social assistance system and to proceed to his expulsion.3

This means that a person, or his or her family member, who has a temporary need for homelessness assistance will not necessarily be ‘an unreasonable burden’ on the social assistance system of the UK, and may be able to make an application for homelessness assistance whilst still retaining his or her status as a self-sufficient person, (or as a family member of a self-sufficient person) and hence remaining a qualified person.

1 As defined at SI 2016/1052, reg 4(2).
3 Directive 2004/38/EC(16)). See also para 2.3.1 of Commission of the European Communities Communication to the European Parliament and the Council on guidance for better transposition and application of Directive 2004/38/EC on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States, COM009313 final and SI 2016/1052, reg 4(3).

11.52 The person’s comprehensive sickness insurance must also cover his or her family members1. Comprehensive sickness insurance cover does not include the public healthcare system of the host state. That is, entitlement to free NHS treatment will not be sufficient2.

1 SI 2016/1052, reg 4(3)(b).

‘STUDENT’

11.53 A student1 is defined as a person who:

• is enrolled for the principal purpose of following a course of study (which includes vocational training) at a public or private establishment which is financed from public funds or accredited by the Secretary of State;
• has comprehensive sickness insurance cover in the United Kingdom; and
• has assured the Secretary of State that he or she has sufficient resources not to become a burden on the UK’s social assistance system2.

The latter two requirements mirror those which are applicable to self-sufficient persons3 meaning a person might retain his or her status as a student and a qualified person whilst also having a temporary need for homelessness assistance.

3 See 11.50–11.52.

‘FAMILY MEMBER’

11.54 ‘Family members’1 are defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 20162, reg 7 as:
11.54 Eligibility for Assistance

- the EEA national’s spouse or civil partner¹;
- any direct descendants of the EEA national, or of his or her spouse or civil partner, who are under 21, or who are dependent on the qualifying person, or his or her spouse or civil partner²;
- any dependent direct relatives in the ascending line of the EEA national or his or her spouse or civil partner³; and
- any extended family member who has been issued with an EEA family permit, a registration certificate or residence card and continues to satisfy the conditions for the issue of the document⁴.

² SI 2016/1052.
³ SI 2016/1052, reg 7(1)(a). A ‘spouse’ means a person who is formally contracted to a legal marriage (Netherlands v Reed 59/85 [1986] ECR 1283, ECJ; R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Monro-Lopez [2007] Imm AR 11, QBD; and Diatta v Land Berlin [1986] 2 CMLR 164, ECJ). ‘Civil partnership’ is defined at Civil Partnership Act 2004, s 1. In both cases, the emphasis is on the legal condition, not on whether or not the parties continue to live together. A marriage or civil partnership only ends upon death, divorce, annulment, or dissolution of the civil partnership. A party to a marriage of convenience, or to a civil partnership of convenience, is excluded from the definition; SI 2016/1052, reg 2(1)).
⁴ SI 2016/1052, reg 7(1)(b).
⁵ SI 2016/1052, reg 7(1)(c).

11.55 There are special rules for students¹.

11.56 ‘Family members’ thus include children who are under 21, dependent children who are 21 or older, dependent parents, parents-in-law, and parents of a qualifying person’s civil partner. So long as children aged 21 or over are ‘dependent’ on the qualifying person, their ages are irrelevant. Children who are not dependent on the qualifying person, but are nevertheless under 21 (for example, an 18-year-old who is working) also fall within the definition.

¹ The inclusion of the word ‘direct’ in SI 2016/1052, reg 7 encompasses grandchildren (and hence grandparents) but not nephews or nieces (or, conversely, aunts or uncles); Bigia v Entry Clearance Officer [2009] EWCA Civ 79, CA per Maurice Kay LJ at [9].

11.57 Cohabiting partners, whether of the same sex or different sex, do not fall within the definition of ‘spouse’ or ‘civil partner’. For cohabiting partners to be ‘family members’, they must be:

- the partner of an EEA national; and
- in a ‘durable relationship’ with him or her; and
- have been issued with an EEA family permit, registration certificate or residence card¹.

¹ SI 2016/1052, regs 7(3) and 8(5).

11.58 Other types of relationship could fall within the definition of ‘extended family members¹’. An ‘extended family member’ is one of the following:

1. a relative of an EEA national, or of his or her spouse or civil partner²:
Who is, and is not, subject to immigration control? 11.60

(a) who is residing in a country other than the UK and is dependent upon the EEA national or is a member of his or her household; or

(b) who was residing in a country other than the UK and was dependent upon the EEA national or was a member of his or her household and is accompanying the EEA national to the UK or wishes to join the EEA national in the UK; or

(c) who was residing in a country other than the UK and was dependent upon the EEA national or was a member of his or her household and who has joined the EEA national in the UK and continues to be dependent upon the EEA national or to be a member of his or her household; or

(2) a relative of an EEA national or of his or her spouse or civil partner and who, on serious health grounds strictly requires the personal care of the EEA national, his or her spouse or civil partner; or

(3) a relative of an EEA national who would meet the requirements in the immigration rules (other than those relating to entry clearance) for indefinite leave to enter or remain in the UK as a dependent relative of the EEA national were the EEA national a person who is present and settled in the UK; or

(4) a partner (other than a civil partner) of an EEA national if he or she can prove that he or she is in a ‘durable relationship’ with the EEA national.

3 See SI 2016/1052, reg 2(1) for ‘durable partner’.
4 SI 2016/1052, reg 8.

11.59 If an extended family member of a qualified person or of an EEA national has been issued with an EEA family permit, a registration certificate or a residence card, he or she is to be treated as a ‘family member’ of a qualified person or of an EEA national for so long as he or she continues to fall within the definition of an ‘extended family member’ and so long as the documentation has not ceased to be valid or been revoked.

1 SI 2016/1052, reg 7(3). Note the differential treatment of EEA nationals who are students at SI 2016/1052, reg 7(2).

11.60 A person who was a family member of a qualified person, or of an EEA national with the permanent right of residence, and who had resided in the UK in accordance with the regulations for at least a year immediately before the death of the qualified person or of the EEA national with the permanent right of residence, may have ‘retained the right of residence’ if the qualified person subsequently dies or ceases to reside in the UK. Similarly, if a person was a spouse or civil partner of a qualified person, and they have divorced or terminated the civil partnership, he or she may have ‘retained the right of residence’. If that is the case, the surviving person (or former spouse or civil partner) may be entitled to the extended right of residence, even though he or she is not a qualifying person.

1 SI 2016/1052, reg 10. The provisions are complex and care should be taken to apply the exact wording of the regulations.
The 'permanent right of residence' is defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, reg 15(1). There are six categories of people who can acquire 'permanent rights of residence':

1. an EEA national who has resided in the UK in accordance with the regulations for a continuous period of five years;
2. a family member of an EEA national who is not himself or herself an EEA national but who has resided in the UK with the EEA national in accordance with the regulations for a continuous period of five years;
3. a worker or self-employed person who has ceased activity;
4. a family member of a worker or self-employed person who has ceased activity;
5. a person who was the family member of a worker or self-employed person where:
   a. the worker or self-employed person has died, and
   b. the family member resided with him or her immediately before his or her death, and
   c. the worker or self-employed person had resided continuously in the UK for at least the two years immediately before his or her death, or the death was the result of an accident at work or an occupational disease; and
6. a person who:
   a. has resided in the UK in accordance with the regulations for a continuous period of five years, and
   b. was, at the end of that period, a family member who has retained the right of residence.

For 'family member', see 11.54–11.60.

6. SI 2016/1052, reg 15(1)(c). Note that 'worker or self-employed person who has ceased activity' is defined at SI 2016/1052, reg 5. The requirement for three years' residence which forms part of that definition (see SI 2016/1052, reg 5(2)(c)) necessitates three years' lawful residence. See Secretary of State for Work and Pensions v Gabeladze [2017] EWCA Civ 1751, CA dealing with the correct interpretation of the Freedom of Movement in the European Union Directive, Directive 2004/38/EC, Arts 16 and 17 which have been transposed into domestic legislation in SI 2016/1052, regs 15 and 5 respectively.

tion (European Economic Area) Regulations 2006\(^1\) came into force in 2006, provided that at all times during that five-year period the applicant was residing lawfully, in accordance with EU law\(^2\).

1. SI 2006/1003 (which preceded SI 2016/1052).

11.63 Continuity of residence for these purposes is to be interpreted in accordance with SI 2016/1052, reg 3 which allows for periods of absence from the United Kingdom which do not exceed six months in total in any year, among other things, while also providing that continuity of residence shall be broken by a period of imprisonment\(^3\).

1. See SI 2016/1052 reg 3(2)–(4) for the complete list of events that are deemed to break (or not break) a person’s continuity of residence.

11.64 The concept of continuity of residence has also fallen for consideration by the courts in a number of cases. In Secretary of State for the Home Department v Ojo\(^4\) the Court of Appeal held that a woman who had resided in the UK continuously for a period of five years, had not acquired the permanent right of residence as she had not been lawfully resident (as a family member) for the entirety of that period. Moore-Bick LJ (with whom the rest of the court agreed) observed that ‘the acquisition of a permanent right of residence depends on continuous residence in a qualifying status and the Directive makes no provision for changes in status’\(^5\). In reaching this decision he drew a distinction between continuity of residence and continuity of status, and refused to draw an analogy with Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2006\(^6\), reg 3(2), which provides that certain breaks in a person’s residence will not affect the continuity of that residence. The acquisition of the permanent right of residence is based on an EU citizen’s integration into a member state, and it is the continuity of lawful residence which satisfies the need for integration. Similarly, in Poltarri v Southwark London Borough Council\(^7\), Jackson LJ refused permission to appeal against a decision that a homeless applicant had not acquired the permanent right to reside as she did not have comprehensive sickness insurance cover during the five-year period.

11.65 In contrast, more recently, in OB v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (ESA)\(^8\) it was suggested by Judge Rowlands that:

‘regulation 15 should be interpreted as requiring continuity of residence, but not necessarily continuity of residence in accordance with the Directive or as a qualified person. However, where a person’s right of permanent residence under regulation 15 depends on his or her having resided in the United Kingdom as a qualified person, the aggregate of any periods of residence as a qualified person must amount to at least five years.’

The appellant in that case had breaks in the continuity of her residence as a qualified person as a result of periods of study where she did not have comprehensive sickness insurance cover. The judge took the view that in light of the importance of integration in this context, periods of study within a member state without a right of residence, could not have been intended to affect continuity in the sense of wiping out the credit gained from any previous residence of the claimant as a qualified person. 'Ojo does not appear to have been cited in OB, and the principles applied in the latter decision should perhaps be treated with a degree of caution, though the two cases are plainly distinguishable on the facts.
11.65 Eligibility for Assistance

The ‘derivative right of residence’

11.66 The derivative rights of residence recognised in Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, reg 16 are based on declarations by the CJEU of various EU Treaty rights. There are five different derivative rights of residence which may be held by the following individuals:

• a primary carer of an EEA national child who is self-sufficient;
• a child in education in the UK who is a child of an EEA national;
• a primary carer of a child in education who is a child of an EEA national;
• a primary carer of a British citizen residing in the UK where the British citizen would be unable to reside in the UK or another EEA member state if the primary carer left the UK for an indefinite period;
• a child whose primary carer is also the primary carer of an EEA national child who is self-sufficient, of a child in education who is a child of an EEA national or of a British citizen child who would be unable to reside in the UK or another EEA member state if the primary carer left the UK for an indefinite period.

1 Defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, SI 2016/1052, reg 16. These derivative rights of residence were declared as EU Treaty rights of residence by the CJEU in various decisions and have now been incorporated into domestic regulation. The rules on eligibility for individuals with this right of residence are set out at 11.141–11.153.
2 SI 2016/1052, reg 16.
3 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(3), (4), (5) and (6).
4 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(2). See 11.73–11.75.
5 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(3). See 11.76–11.77.

11.67 It should be noted that these derivative rights can only be exercised in certain circumstances, such as when a child is in education or needs a primary carer. If the relevant circumstance comes to an end, and the holder of the derivative right of residence has no claim on any other right of residence under the regulations or EU law, he or she will no longer have any right to reside.

11.68 Residence in the UK as a result of the exercise of a derivative right of residence does not constitute ‘residence’ for the purpose of acquiring a permanent right of residence1.

1  SI 2016/1052, reg 15(2). For permanent right of residence, see 11.61–11.65.

11.69 None of these derivative rights require the recipient to be a national of an EEA member state. Indeed, the rights will often be exercised by people who are not nationals of the UK or of any other EEA member state1.

1  By SI 2016/1052, reg 16(1), a derivative right can only be exercised by a person who is not an 'exempt person', as defined by reg 16(7). In broad terms this means that only those who have no other right to reside can exercise a derivative right of residence, for example, nationals of EEA member states who do not have one of the other rights of residence discussed at 11.35–11.65. The particular derivative right of residence identified in SI 2016/1052, reg 16(5), 'the Zambrano right of residence' (see 11.80–11.85), can only be enjoyed by a national of a non-EEA member state.

11.70 These ‘derivative’ rights of residence identify rights which, among other outcomes, enable former workers and other formerly qualified persons to exercise a right to reside. They provide that a child who is in education because of the exercise of his or her parent’s right of residence as a ‘worker derives a right of residence from his or her parent’s right’. The child’s right would be meaningless if his or her primary carer could not also enjoy a right of residence and so the first and third rights are derived from the exercise of the child’s right2. A primary carer’s right of residence would also be meaningless if his or her children, for whom he or she is the primary carer, did not also have a right of residence3.

1  SI 2016/1052, reg 16(3). See 11.76–11.77.
2  SI 2016/1052, reg 16(2) and (4). See 11.73–11.75 and 11.78–11.79.

11.71 A derivative right of residence is not contingent on any declaration or grant of leave by the Secretary of State. The right will exist as long as the conditions set out in reg 16 are satisfied1. However, a derivative right of residence can be withdrawn or cancelled by the Secretary of State on the grounds that it is conducive to the public good to do so2.

1  R (Sanneh) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2015] EWCA Civ 49, [2015] HLR 27, CA. An appeal by one of the Claimants in that case (on another issue) was dismissed by the Supreme Court in R (HC) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2017] UKSC 73, [2017] 3 WLR 1486, SC.
2  SI 2016/1052, reg 16(12).

11.72 Neither of the Codes give any substantive guidance on any of these derivative rights, or even on the cases decided by the CJEU which gave rise to the Regulation3. Each right will now be discussed in turn.

A primary carer of an EEA national child who is self-sufficient

11.73 A person will have a derivative right to reside1 in the UK if he or she is:

• not an exempt person2;
• the primary carer of an EEA national; and 11.73 Eligibility for Assistance

- the EEA national is:
  - under the age of 18;
  - is residing in the UK as a self-sufficient person; and
  - would be unable to remain in the UK if the primary carer left the UK for an indefinite period.

1 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(2).
2 ‘Exempt person’ is defined as a person who has a right to reside in the UK as a result of any other provision of SI 2016/1052, or who has a right of abode in the UK by virtue of s 2 Immigration Act 1971 or who has indefinite leave to enter or remain in the UK or has been exempted from these provisions: SI 2016/1052, reg 16(7).
3 For ‘self-sufficient person’ see SI 2016/1052, reg 4(1)(c) and 11.50–11.52.
4 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(2). This right was declared by the CJEU in October 2004 in Chen v UK (C-200/02, [2005] All ER (EC) 129, ECJ).

11.74 The primary carer need not be a national of an EEA member state but the child must be. A ‘primary carer’ is defined as a direct relative or legal guardian of the child and either has primary responsibility for the child’s care or shares responsibility equally with another person who is not an exempt person. ‘Responsibility’ requires more than a financial contribution towards care.

1 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(8).
2 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(11). See also the additional definitions regarding shared care at SI 2016/1052, reg 16(9) and (10).

11.75 This right will cease if:

- the person is no longer the primary carer of the child;
- the child reaches the age of 18;
- the child is no longer in the UK or is no longer self-sufficient;
- the child ceases to need a primary carer.

A child in education in the UK who is a child of an EEA national 11.76 A person will have a derivative right to reside in the UK if he or she is:

- not an exempt person;
- any of his or her parents is an EEA national who resides or has resided in the UK;
- he or she resides, or has resided, in the UK at a time when his or her EEA national parent was residing in the UK as a worker; and
- he or she is in education in the UK.

1 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(3).
2 See 11.73 fn 3.
3 For ‘worker’, see SI 2016/1052, reg 4(1)(a) and 11.40–11.46. Note that the extended definition of ‘worker’ at reg 6(2) does not apply to this regulation (reg 16(7)(b)).
4 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(3).

11.77 The child need not himself or herself be a national of an EEA member state but one of his or her parents must be. Furthermore, that parent must have resided in the UK as a worker. The child must have been, at some point, in education at a time when his or her parent was in the UK. There is no requirement that the parent should still be in the UK, or should still be a worker¹. Note that the word ‘child’ is used here to describe the relationship between the person enjoying the derivative right to reside and his or her EEA national parent², since the right arises, in part, from the existence of that relationship. But the word ‘child’ is not actually used in Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, reg 16(3) and there is no suggestion in the regulation that the right ceases when the child turns 18. However, it will cease when he or she ceases to be in education, whether that occurs before or after his or her eighteenth birthday. ‘Education’ does not include nursery education³.

¹ Indeed it is likely that the parent is either no longer in the UK, or no longer has any EU rights of residence, as otherwise the child would probably be a family member and be entitled to the same right of residence as his or her parent.
² As opposed to being a reference to his or her age.
³ SI 2016/1052, reg 16(7)(a). This right was declared by the CJEU in R (Bidar) v Ealing London Borough Council C209–03, [2005] QB 812, ECJ.

A primary carer of a child in education who is a child of an EEA national 11.78 The primary carer of a child who has the derivative right described at 11.76–11.77 will also have a derivative right of residence¹. That right exists where:

• the primary carer is not an exempt person;
• the child of an EEA national parent resides, or has resided, in the UK at a time when the parent was residing here as a worker;
• the child is in education in the UK;
• the child has a primary carer; and
• the child would be unable to continue to be educated in the UK if the primary carer left the UK for an indefinite period¹.

³ SI 2016/1052, reg 16(4).

11.79 For ‘primary carer’, see 11.74. For ‘education’, see 11.77. This right ends when:

• the person ceases to be the child’s primary carer;
• the child ceases to need a primary carer; or
• the child ceases to be in education¹.

¹ This right was declared by the CJEU in several cases: Baumbast & R v SHHD [2002] ECR 1–7091, ECJ; Ibrahim v Harrow London Borough Council C-310/08, [2010] HLR 31, CJEU; and Teixeira v Lambeth London Borough Council, C4–380/08, [2010] HLR 32, CJEU.

A primary carer of a British citizen residing in the UK where the British citizen would be unable to reside in the UK or another EEA member state if the primary carer left the UK for an indefinite period
11.80 A person will have a derivative right of residence¹ in the UK if he or she is:
11.80 Eligibility for Assistance

- not an exempt person;
- the primary carer of a British citizen;
- the British citizen for whom he or she cares is residing in the UK; and
- the British citizen would be unable to reside in the UK or in another EEA member state if his or her primary carer left the UK for an indefinite period.

2 See 11.73 fn 3.
3 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(5).

11.81 For ‘primary carer’, see 11.74. This derivative right of residence was recognised by CJEU in the case of Zambrano v Office national de l’emploi.

1 C34/9, [2012] QB 265, CJEU.

11.82 The circumstances in which this derivative right of residence will arise have been considered by the courts in a number of cases. In Harrison v Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Court of Appeal held that the principle in Zambrano did not cover anything short of the situation where an EU citizen would be forced to leave the EU. In particular, it would not arise in circumstances where an EU citizen is not forced, as a matter of substance, to follow the non-EU national out of the EU, but where his or her continuing residence in the EU is affected because, for example, his or her quality of life is diminished.

11.83 In Hines v Lambeth London Borough Council the Court of Appeal, applying the decision in Harrison v Secretary of State for the Home Department, held that a non-EU national would only be granted a derivative right to reside as the primary carer of a British citizen, if that British citizen would be effectively compelled to leave the United Kingdom if the primary carer were required to leave. Where the British citizen was a child, the welfare of that child, including any impairment of his or her quality of life, should be taken into account in considering whether he or she would be effectively compelled to leave. But his or her welfare could not be the paramount consideration because that would be flatly inconsistent with the statutory test under Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2006, reg 15A(4A).

11.84 In R (Sameh) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions the High Court held that the availability of support under the Children Act 1989, s 17 to a child who was a British citizen, could be taken into account in assessing whether the effect of a national measure was such that she would be forced to leave the EU, in contravention of the Zambrano right of residence. In that case the claimant was the mother of a British citizen. She sought to...

challenge regulations excluding her from mainstream social security benefits on the basis that without those benefits she would be compelled to leave the EU owing to a lack of means and that her daughter would be forced to leave with her. Her application for judicial review was dismissed, as ‘realistically, the Claimant was not going to leave the United Kingdom in the foreseeable future, because the Council’s s 17 support would inevitably ensure that neither EU law nor European human rights law would be breached’.

3 [2013] EWHC 793 (Admin), Admin Ct per Hickinbottom J at para 97.

11.85 The beneficiaries of this derivative right of residence will be adults who are not nationals of any EEA member state. They will be entitled to the derivative right of residence for so long as they are a primary carer of a British citizen child or adult who needs a primary carer. The right will cease if:

- the person ceases to be the primary carer of the British citizen;
- the British citizen no longer requires the primary carer; or
- either the British citizen or his or her primary carer has a right of residence in another EEA member state.

A child whose primary carer is also a primary carer of a EEA national child who is self-sufficient or of a child in education who is a child of an EEA national or of a British citizen child who would be unable to reside in the UK or another EEA member state if the primary carer left the UK for an indefinite period

11.86 The child of a person who has a derivative right to reside as a primary carer of a child who is an EEA national and is self-sufficient, or of a child in education who is a child of an EEA national, or of a British citizen child who would be unable to reside in the UK or another EEA member state if the primary carer left the UK for an indefinite period will also have a derivative right of residence so long as:

- the child is not an exempt person;
- the child entitled to this derivative right is under the age of 18;
- his or her primary carer is entitled to the derivative right to reside in the UK by virtue of either reg 16(2), (4) or (5) of SI 2016/1052;
- the child does not have leave to enter or remain in the UK; and
- if the child left the UK for an indefinite period, his or her primary carer would be prevented from residing in the UK.

11.86 Eligibility for Assistance

For ‘primary carer’, see 11.74. For ‘self-sufficient’, see 11.50–11.52. For ‘education’, see 11.77. The child entitled to the derivative right does not have to be related by blood or marriage either to his or her primary carer or to the child from whose right to reside the primary carer’s right is derived. However, the primary carer must be the primary carer of both children. This right ends when:

- the child reaches the age of 18;
- the derivative right of residence of the child’s primary carer comes to an end;
- the child acquires leave to enter or remain in the UK or an EEA right of residence; or
- the child ceases to need a primary carer.

The special rules for Croatian nationals

11.88 Croatia, which acceded to the EU on 1 July 2013, is the newest member of the EU. The rules governing the circumstances in which a Croatian national will acquire one of the various rights of residence available to EEA nationals are slightly different to those which apply to nationals of other EEA states. A Croatian national (save for certain exceptions discussed at 11.91) will be classed as an ‘Accession State national subject to worker authorisation’, as defined by the Accession of Croatia (Immigration and Worker Authorisation) Regulations 2013 during the first 12 months of his or her employment.

1 Accession of Croatia (Immigration and Worker Authorisation) Regulations 2013, SI 2013/1460. The rules on eligibility for individuals with this right of residence are set out at 12.122–11.140.

11.89 An Accession State national subject to worker authorisation and authorised in accordance with the Accession Regulations 20131 will only be classed as a worker during such time as he or she holds an Accession Worker authorisation document and is working in accordance with the conditions set out in that document. The document normally issued is an EEA registration card. In addition, a Croatian national who is a job-seeker will not have any right of residence. The combined effect of these rules is that a Croatian national will only have a right to reside as long as he or she holds an Accession Worker authorisation document and is working in accordance with that document. Residence that does not meet these requirements will not be regarded as lawful residence for the purposes of acquiring a permanent right to reside under SI 2016/1052, reg 15(1)(c).

11.90 After 30 June 2018, Croatian nationals are to be treated in the same way as other EEA nationals.1

1 SI 2013/1460, reg 1(2) and reg 5. The Secretary of State has the power to make regulations to extend this period pursuant to European Union (Croatian Accession and Irish Protocol) Act 2013, s 4. However, at the time of writing this power had not been exercised and UK Visas and Immigration had indicated that it would not be: see https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/guidance-for-croatian-nationals-on-getting-permission-to-work-in-the-uk (last accessed on 22 May 2018).

11.91 Not all Croatian nationals fall within the definition of ‘an Accession State national subject to worker authorisation’. They should be treated in the same way as other EEA nationals if they fall into one of these categories:

- a person who, on 30 June 2013, had leave to enter or remain without any restriction on taking employment other than a condition restricting his or her employment as a doctor or dentist in training or as a sports coach; or
- a person who has legally worked in the UK without interruption for a period of 12 months; or
- a person who is also a national of the UK or of another EEA Member State (other than Croatia); or
- a person who is at the same time a national of Bulgaria or Romania who is subject to worker authorisation within the meaning of Accession (Immigration and Authorisation) Regulations 2006, reg 2(7); or
- a spouse, civil partner, unmarried or same-sex partner or child under 18 of a person who has leave to remain under the Immigration Act 1971 that allows him or her to live and work in the UK; or
- a spouse, civil partner, unmarried or same-sex partner of a UK national or of a person settled in the UK; or
- a diplomat or family member of a diplomat; or
- a person who is exempt from the provisions of the Immigration Act 1971 by virtue of an order made under Immigration Act 1971, s 8(2); or
- a person who has a permanent right of residence pursuant to Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, reg 15; or
- a person who is the family member of an EEA national who has a right to reside in the United Kingdom. Though where the EEA national is himself or herself subject to worker authorisation under SI 2013/1460 or is a Bulgarian or Romanian national subject to worker authorisation under Accession (Immigration and Authorisation) Regulations 2006, this exemption will only apply where the former is the spouse, civil partner, unmarried or same-sex partner of the latter or where the latter is a dependant under the age of 21 who is a direct descendant of the former, or of his or her spouse or civil partner; or
11.91 Eligibility for Assistance

- a person who holds a registration certificate to the effect that he or she is a highly skilled person and has unconditional access to the labour market\(^1\); or
- a person who is in the UK as a student, and either holds a registration certificate that includes a statement that he or she is a student who may work in the UK whilst a student, and who is working not more than 20 hours a week during term time (unless following a course of vocational training)\(^2\), or has leave to enter or remain under Immigration Act 1971 as a student and who is working in accordance with any conditions attached to that leave\(^3\); or
- a ‘posted worker’\(^4\).

EU rights of residence not contained in domestic Regulations

11.93 There may be rights of residence, that are not specifically identified in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016\(^6\). Such rights may potentially arise under a variety of provisions including Arts 20, 21 and 56 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU\(^2\).

Article 20 on the rights of nationals of EU member states to be EU citizens; Art 21 on the rights of EU citizens to move and reside as EU citizens; Art 56 on the freedom to provide and receive services. The Scottish Court of Session, in the case of O v Aberdeen City Council [2017] CSOH 9, 2017 SLT 181, has recently rejected an attempt to argue that a homeless EEA national applicant, who was not a qualified person but who was a victim of trafficking, had a right to reside under Art 21 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU. See [44]–[49].
WORKING OUT WHETHER THE APPLICANT IS ELIGIBLE

Overview

11.94 The main provisions governing eligibility and exclusion are HA 1996, s 185(1) and its counterpart, H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(1). They provide that ‘a person from abroad who is ineligible for housing assistance’ is not eligible for assistance from a local housing authority under the homelessness provisions in HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, ss 66, 68, 73 or 75 respectively. Working out who is, and who is not, caught by that term is therefore crucial in deciding whether homelessness services can be provided.

2 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

11.95 There are two categories of ‘persons from abroad’ for the purposes of HA 1996, s 185 and H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1.

(1) Those subject to immigration control:
- are not eligible for assistance;
- unless they fall within a class prescribed as ‘eligible’ in regulations made by the Secretary of State or the Welsh Ministers.

(2) Those not subject to immigration control but who are nevertheless prescribed by regulations as being ‘persons from abroad’:
- are not eligible if they are not habitually resident in the Common Travel Area unless they are prescribed as exempt from the habitual residence test; and
- are not eligible if they are prescribed as ineligible because of their particular rights of residence under European Union law.

1 See 11.26–11.93 for discussion of whether a person is, or is not, subject to immigration control.

2 HA 1996, s 185(2); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(2).

3 HA 1996, s 185(3); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(3).

11.96 As is apparent from the terms of these provisions, the general rule is that people from abroad are excluded. But the Secretary of State and the Welsh Ministers each have the power to make regulations exempting some people from abroad from that exclusory rule. They each also have the power to make regulations excluding people who would otherwise be eligible. Each of these powers has been exercised in both England and Wales.

1 They cannot designate as eligible any person who is excluded from entitlement to universal credit or housing benefit by the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, s 115 (HA 1996, s 185(2A); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(3)). Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, s 115 prescribes that ‘a person subject to immigration control’ is not eligible for universal credit or housing benefit unless he or she falls within one of the classes of people prescribed by the Secretary of State. Classes of persons subject to immigration control who are entitled to housing benefit are prescribed in the Social Security (Immigration and Asylum) Consequential Amendment Regulations 2000, SI 2000/636, reg 2 and Sch 1, Pt 1 and the Housing Benefit Regulations 2006, SI 2006/213, reg 10(3B).

11.97 For England, the Secretary of State has made the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006, which apply to all

Working out whether the applicant is eligible 11.102

11.99 In Wales, the Welsh Ministers have made the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014\(^1\), which apply to all applications for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in Wales made on or after 31 October 2014\(^2\). These Regulations were originally enacted under HA 1996, Pt 7 but now apply to the H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 by virtue of the saving provision contained in the Housing (Wales) Act 2014 (Commencement No 3 and Transitional, Transitional and Saving Provisions) Order 2015, art 5\(^3\). These have been amended by the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) (Amendment) Regulations 2017\(^4\).

11.100 The regulations in both England and Wales (which are now virtually identical, although historically there were differences) set out classes of persons who are subject to immigration control but are prescribed as eligible nevertheless. They also set out classes of persons who are not subject to immigration control, but are nevertheless ineligible. Each of the two categories of persons from abroad (those subject to immigration control and those not subject to such control) needs careful examination.

Category One: those who are subject to immigration control

11.101 The starting point is that:

> ‘. . . a person who is subject to immigration control within the meaning of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 is not eligible for housing assistance unless he is of a class prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State’.

---

1 HA 1996, s 185(2); H(W)A 2014, Sch 1, para 1(2).

The exclusionary rule

11.102 The basic rule is that ‘a person subject to immigration control’\(^1\) is not eligible. The exceptions to this exclusionary rule are contained in classes set out in regulations. Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006\(^2\), reg 5 and Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014\(^3\), reg 5 prescribe that the following classes of persons from abroad are eligible even though they are subject to immigration control:

1. Class A\(^4\): a person recorded by the Secretary of State as a refugee and who has leave to enter or remain in the UK.
2. Class B\(^5\): a person who has:
   (a) exceptional leave to enter or remain in the UK granted outside of the provisions of the Immigration Rules; and
   (b) whose leave is not subject to conditions requiring him or her to maintain and accommodate himself or herself and any dependents without recourse to public funds.

11.102 Eligibility for Assistance

(3) Class C: a person who:
   (a) is habitually resident in the CTA; and
   (b) has current leave to enter or remain in the UK which is not subject to any limitation or condition; but
   (c) is not a person who:
      (i) has been given leave to enter or remain in the UK upon a written undertaking from a sponsor that he or she will be responsible for maintenance and accommodation; and
      (ii) has been resident in the CTA for less than five years beginning on the date of entry or the date of the undertaking (whichever is the later date); and
      (iii) whose sponsor is still alive.

(4) Class D: a person who has humanitarian protection granted under the Immigration Rules.

(5) Class F: Afghan citizens granted leave to enter under Immigration Rules, para 276BA1 who are habitually resident in the CTA.

(6) Class G: A person who has limited leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom on family or private life grounds under Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, such leave granted:
   (a) under para 276BE(1), para 276DG or Appendix FM of the Immigration Rules, and
   (b) who is not subject to a condition requiring that person to maintain and accommodate himself, and any person dependent upon him, without recourse to public funds.

13 The requirements of SI 2006/1294, reg 5(1)(g), strictly, do not make grammatical sense: a point highlighted in the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments Thirteenth Report of Session 2016–17, 16 November 2016 at para 2.4. However, if one avoids an overly technical reading, the scope of the class is clear. This grammatical error has been avoided in SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 5(1)(g).

11.103 Extremely limited guidance on the scope of Classes A–G is given in the English Code at para 7.12. Slightly more in depth guidance is given in the Welsh Code at para 7.8. The classes are individually considered at 11.106–11.121.

1 Though the Welsh Code pre-dates the introduction of class G.

11.104 A number of the Classes contain terms that are defined by the regulations or by case law. For the meaning of:

- ‘Common Travel Area (CTA)’ see Box 1 at 11.28;
Working out whether the applicant is eligible 11.108

- ‘habitually resident’ see 11.130–11.136;
- ‘UK’ see Box 1 at 11.28.

11.105 Even if an applicant is eligible under any of these six Classes, any members of his or her household who are not eligible are to be disregarded for the purposes of deciding whether the applicant is homeless and whether he or she has a priority need.

Exemptions from the exclusionary rule

Class A: refugees

11.106 If a former asylum seeker has been granted refugee status by the Secretary of State, he or she will also have the ‘leave to enter or remain in the UK’ required for Class A purposes and will be eligible for homelessness assistance, welfare benefits, community care services and for an allocation of social housing according to the same criteria as those applicable to British citizens. Leave may be granted either for an indefinite period or limited for five years.

11.107 It is not unusual for someone to be granted refugee status and then to apply for his or her family to come to the UK. The family enters the UK with the refugee acting as their sponsor. A refugee is entitled to such family reunion, and so the usual rules regarding maintenance and accommodation (which would normally involve a condition of ‘no recourse to public funds’) do not apply to a refugee’s family members.

1 See R (Jimaali) v Haringey London Borough Council (2002) November Legal Action, p 24, Admin Ct for discussion of the specific meaning and effect of the word sponsor in this context.

2 See Immigration Rules, HC 395 (23 May 1994 as amended), paras 352A–352F.

11.108 Once a former asylum-seeker is granted refugee status, any accommodation which was provided by the Home Office under Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, Pt 6 will be withdrawn. If the asylum-seeker was occupying accommodation provided by the Home Office under Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, s 95 (the main duty to provide support to asylum-seekers), he or she will have a local connection with the local housing authority in whose district the accommodation was situated. This does not preclude the former asylum-seeker from establishing a local connection, or several local connections, elsewhere, whether by residence, family associations, employment or special circumstances. He or she might then have a local connection with more than one local housing authority.

1 Formerly the National Asylum Support Service or ‘NASS’.

11.109 Eligibility for Assistance

Class B: exceptional leave to enter or remain

11.109 ‘Exceptional leave to enter or remain’ was generally a status granted to asylum-seekers whose claim for full refugee status had not succeeded but where the Home Office recognised that there were compelling humanitarian and/or compassionate circumstances that required that the applicant should be allowed to stay in the UK. From 1 April 2003, the Home Office has called leave granted in those circumstances ‘humanitarian protection’ or ‘discretionary leave’. Viewed broadly, anyone who was granted leave to enter or remain when the Secretary of State has recognised that he or she does not fully meet the requirements of the Immigration Rules has been treated ‘exceptionally’ and may be said to have been granted ‘exceptional leave’ and the expectation of the Ministry of Housing, Communities and Local Government is that such persons should fall within Class B. Leave is normally, but not always, granted for a period of 30 months.

11.110 People with exceptional leave to enter or remain will be eligible for homelessness assistance unless that leave is subject to a condition requiring them to maintain and accommodate themselves (and their dependents) without recourse to public funds. The presence or absence of such a condition will be manifest from the document (or stamp) containing the grant of leave itself.

11.111 Unless they fall within the prohibition of ‘no recourse to public funds’, they will not only be entitled to homelessness assistance but also to welfare benefits and community care services, and can apply for an allocation of social housing.

Class C: a person with current leave to enter or remain in the UK with no condition or limitation and who is habitually resident in the Common Travel Area

11.112 The type of leave contemplated by this Class is commonly referred to as ‘indefinite leave to enter or remain’ and cannot be granted subject to conditions. Anyone granted indefinite leave to enter or remain will be eligible if he or she is also habitually resident in the CTA.

For the meaning of 'habitually resident', see 11.130–11.136. For the ‘Common Travel Area’, see Box 1 at 11.28.

11.113 If leave to enter or remain has been granted on the basis of a written undertaking that a sponsor would be responsible for the applicant’s maintenance and accommodation, the applicant will not be eligible for homeless assistance under Class C for five years running from:
- the date of his or her arrival in the UK; or
- the date the sponsorship undertaking was given;
starting from whichever is the later event.

11.114 After those five years, or if the sponsor (or at least one of several sponsors) dies within the five years, an applicant will be eligible under this class (subject to satisfying the test of habitual residence).

2 See 11.130–11.136.

CLASS D: A PERSON GRANTED HUMANITARIAN PROTECTION UNDER THE IMMIGRATION RULES

11.115 ‘Humanitarian protection’ is granted to those people whose claims for asylum do not succeed, but who have international protection needs (ie they face a serious risk of the death penalty, unlawful killing, torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment if removed from the UK). The status must be granted pursuant to the Immigration Rules. People with humanitarian protection are entitled to family reunion in the same way as refugees.

CLASS F: AFGHAN CITIZENS GRANTED LEAVE TO ENTER UNDER IMMIGRATION RULES, PARA 276BA1, WHO ARE HABITUALLY RESIDENT IN THE CTA

11.116 This class consists of persons habitually resident in the CTA who have limited leave to enter the United Kingdom as a relevant Afghan citizen under para 276BA1 of the Immigration Rules. This is a niche category of leave offered to locally engaged staff in Afghanistan who worked in particularly challenging or dangerous roles in Helmand province.

Class G: person who has limited leave to enter or remain in the UK on family or private life grounds under Article 8, who is not subject to a no recourse to public funds condition

11.117 To fall within this class a person must:

(a) have limited leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom on family or private life grounds under Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, such leave granted under paragraph 276BE(1), paragraph 276DG or Appendix FM of the Immigration Rules,

(b) not be subject to a condition requiring that person to maintain and accommodate himself, and any person dependent upon him, without recourse to public funds.

This class was introduced in 2016 in England and 2017 in Wales. The purpose of the amendment was to ensure that homeless persons who have been granted limited leave to remain under paragraph 276BE(1), paragraph 276DG or Appendix FM of the Immigration Rules to the Immigration Rules, who are not subject to a no recourse to public funds condition are able to access homelessness assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2.

2 Immigration Rules, HC 395 (23 May 1994, as amended).

3 The requirements of SI 2006/1294, reg 5(1)(g), strictly, do not make grammatical sense: a point highlighted in the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments Thirteenth Report of Session 2016–17, 16 November 2016 at para 2.4. However, if one refrains from an overly technical reading, the scope of the class is clear and the requirements have been set out here so as to avoid reproducing the error. This grammatical error has been avoided in SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 5(1)(g).

4 SI 2016/1294, reg 5(1)(g) was added by the the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2016, FN SI 2016/965, in force from 30 October 2016, SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 5(1)(g) was added by the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) (Amendment) Regulations 2017, SI 2017/698 (W 164).

5 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

11.118 The need for the amendments arose from the fact that until July 2012, those seeking leave to remain in the UK relying on Art 8 grounds, would typically have been granted leave outside of the Immigration Rules. As such they would have been eligible for homelessness assistance, under class B provided they were not subject to a no recourse to public funds condition.

1 See Letter from the Homelessness Directorate (Office of the Deputy Prime Minister) to Chief Executives and Housing Directors of English local housing authorities, dated 25 March 2003 and Letter from the Department of Communities and Local Government to Chief Executives and Chief Housing Officers of Local Authorities in England, dated 21 October 2016.

11.119 But in July 2012, the Home Office introduced various new provisions into the Immigration Rules to deal with these cases. Thereafter most Art 8 applications were dealt with within the rules, under para 276BE(1), para-
Working out whether the applicant is eligible

11.123

The unintended consequence of this change to the Immigration Rules was that homeless persons granted leave to remain on Art 8 grounds outside of the rules were treated more favourably than those granted Art 8 leave within the rules. On a literal interpretation of class B the former were eligible for assistance whereas the latter were not. On the face of it there was no particular justification for this differential treatment. This led to a number of challenges and, in due course, the amendment of the regulations to remove this inconsistency.

1. See R (Nagre) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2013] EWHC 720 (Admin), Admin Ct per Sales J at [7]–[12] and R (NS) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2014] EWHC 1971 (Admin), [2014] Imm AR 1153, Admin Ct per Kenneth Parker J at [54]–[56], for the background to the changes to the Immigration Rules.

2. For example, Samuels v Lewisham LBC (2016) September Legal Action, pp 37–38, County Court at Central London.

11.121 If a person who is subject to immigration control is not within any of the Classes A–G described above, and made his or her application for homelessness assistance on or after 1 June 2006 (to a local housing authority in England) or 31 October 2014 (to a local housing authority in Wales), he or she is not ‘eligible’ for homelessness assistance.

Category Two: other ‘persons from abroad’

11.122 Ordinarily, persons not subject to immigration control would be eligible for homelessness assistance. However, the Secretary of State and Welsh Ministers are permitted to make regulations treating some people who are not subject to immigration control as ‘persons from abroad’ and therefore ineligible for homelessness assistance. Both have exercised these powers.

1. See 11.26–11.93 for detailed discussion of how to determine who is, and is not, subject to immigration control.

11.123 In the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006 and the Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014 the Secretary of State and the Welsh Ministers have exercised their powers to treat some people who are not subject to immigration control as ‘persons from abroad’. This means that some British citizens, nationals of EEA Member States, and others who are exempt from immigration control may nevertheless be denied homelessness assistance on the grounds that they are ‘not eligible’. The primary function of these provisions is to confine homelessness assistance to the ordinary residents of the UK, ie those habitually resident here, and to EEA nationals exercising Treaty rights.

3 For applications for homelessness assistance made before 1 June 2006 in England and before 31 October 2014 in Wales, see the first and third editions of this book respectively.

11.124 Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) Regulations 2006, reg 6 and Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) Regulations 2014, reg 6 establish three classes of people who are to be treated as ‘persons from abroad’ and therefore ineligible for housing assistance despite not being subject to immigration control. They are described in the English Code at para 7.13 and in the Welsh Code at paras 7.9–7.12.

11.125 The first class1 comprises persons who are ‘not habitually resident’2 in the CT A. But that test of habitual residence is subject to a number of exemptions4.

2 See 11.130–11.136.
3 See Box 1 at 11.28.
4 See 11.137–11.140.

11.126 The second class Comprises EEA nationals and their family members whose only right to reside in the UK is derived from:

• their status as job-seekers;
• their status as family members of job-seekers;
• the exercise of the initial right to reside in the UK for a period not exceeding three months;
• the exercise of a derivative right to reside in the UK as the primary carer of a British citizen; or
• the exercise of a right to reside derived from Art 20 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU1.

11.127 The third class Comprises EEA nationals and their family members whose only right to reside in the rest of the CT A (Channel Islands, Isle of Man or the Republic of Ireland) is derived from:

• their status as job-seekers;
• their status as family members of job-seekers;
• the exercise of the initial right to reside in the UK for a period not exceeding three months;
• the exercise of a derivative right to reside in the CT A as the primary carer of an Irish or British citizen;
• the exercise of a right to reside derived from Art 20 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU1.

Working out whether the applicant is eligible 11.132

11.128 Each of the three classes will be examined in turn.

11.129 Note that even if an applicant is eligible under any of these three classes, any members of his or her household who are not eligible will be classed as restricted persons, which may modify the nature of any duty owed to the applicant\(^1\).

\(^1\) See 11.157–11.172.

The first class: not habitually resident

11.130 ‘Habitual residence\(^1\)’ does not refer to someone’s immigration status. A person may be a British citizen, but if he or she is not habitually resident in the CTA\(^2\), he or she will not be eligible\(^3\). Nor is the term ‘habitual residence’ defined in either HA 1996, Pt 7\(^4\), H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 or in the regulations\(^5\). It is a question of fact for the local housing authority to decide. Happily, there is some guidance in the Codes of Guidance\(^6\).

\(^1\) SI 2006/1294, reg 6(1)(a); SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 6(1)(a).
\(^2\) See Box 1 at 11.28.
\(^3\) Unless he or she is exempt from the habitual residence test. See 11.137–11.140.
\(^4\) As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
\(^5\) SI 2006/1294 and SI 2014/2603 (W 257).

11.131 A person who is not habitually resident will also not be entitled to non-contributory social security benefits. If the person is receiving one of those social security benefits, it must follow that the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) has determined that he or she is habitually resident\(^1\). A determination by the DWP is not necessarily binding on a local housing authority\(^2\) but in the interests of good administration and consistent decision making, such a determination should certainly be taken into account by the local housing authority during the decision making process\(^3\) and reasons should be given if the local housing authority elects to depart from the determination\(^4\).

\(^1\) A person who has a derivative right of residence contained at SI 2016/1052, reg 16(5) (the ‘Zambrano’ right of residence) is treated as not habitually resident for the purposes of entitlement to income support, jobseeker’s allowance, state pension credit, and housing benefit (SI 2012/2587, in force 8 November 2012) and for universal credit (SI 2013/376, reg 9). See 11.145 fn 3.
\(^2\) In Mangion v Lewisham London Borough Council [2008] EWCA Civ 1642, (2009) January Legal Action, p 26, CA and Simpson-Lowe v Croydon London Borough Council [2012] EWCA Civ 131, (2012) April Legal Action, p 47, CA the Court of Appeal took the view that the findings of the DWP relating to eligibility for disability benefits were not binding on a local housing authority when assessing vulnerability: see 9.76. However, that was because different legal tests applied in the different legal contexts under consideration. With habitual residence, the same test is applied by both the DWP and the local housing authority.
\(^3\) See R (Clue) v Birmingham City Council [2010] EWCA Civ 460, [2011] 1 WLR 99, CA on the importance of consistent decision making across government departments and local authorities.
\(^4\) See 9.111–9.125 on the duty to give reasons.

11.132 There are two aspects required to be present in order to constitute habitual residence:
11.132 Eligibility for Assistance

(1) a settled purpose of establishing residence in one of the territories of the CTA; and

(2) an appreciable period of such residence.

1 For ‘CTA’, see 11.28, Box 1.

11.133 Whether each aspect is satisfied is a question of fact for the local housing authority to decide. The Codes advise that normally, if someone has lived in one of the territories of the CTA for two years continuously prior to his or her application for homelessness assistance, he or she should be considered to be habitually resident without further inquiry. However, that should not be taken as meaning that a person cannot be habitually resident if he or she has lived in one of the territories of the CTA for less than two years. The point is simply that there is little point in a local housing authority wasting resources by making inquiries into whether or not an applicant who came to the UK more than two years ago is habitually resident. In R (Paul-Coker) v Southwark London Borough Council, a number of instances where people had been resident for periods of time that were shorter than two years, but had been sufficient to constitute 'an appreciable period', were cited to the judge. He said: '[i]t is therefore clear that what constitutes an appreciable period of time for these purposes will vary from case to case and will depend on the facts of the individual case'. In that particular case the local housing authority was wrong in law to have directed itself that an applicant had to have been resident for six months before she could be considered to be habitually resident.

1 English Code, para 7.19 and Annex 1, para 4; Welsh Code, paras 2.22 and 7.13 and Annex 6, para 4.

11.134 Establishing a 'settled purpose' will obviously involve consideration of an applicant’s subjective intentions and motivations. Someone in stable employment may be more likely to be able to establish his or her 'settled purpose' to be habitually resident than someone who is in transitory employment, or dependent on benefit. However, local housing authorities must be careful not to give too much weight to an applicant’s lack of finances and not enough weight to other factors such as the applicant’s nationality, ties with the UK, and future intentions.

11.135 What constitutes an ‘appreciable period of residence’ likewise varies according to the circumstances of each individual’s case. If a former British resident returns to the UK after living and working abroad, she or he may be habitually resident from the first day of his or her return. When someone is coming to live in the UK for the first time, there must be an appreciable period of residence before habitual residence is obtained. To determine how long that period of residence should be in any particular case, local housing authorities should consider all the circumstances, including:

• whether the person is seeking to bring any family members to the CTA;
Working out whether the applicant is eligible 11.137

- whether he or she has brought his or her personal property and possessions to the CTA;
- whether he or she has done everything necessary to establish a residence before coming;
- whether he or she has a right of abode; and
- what ‘durable ties’ there are with the CTA.

1 Swaddling v Adjudication Officer [1999] All ER (EC) 217 ECJ; and see CIS/1304/1997 and CJSA/5394/1998; and English Code, para 7.20 and Annex 1, paras 7–8.
2 Nessa v Chief Adjudication Officer [1999] 1 WLR 1937, HL.

11.136 In R (Paul-Coker) v Southwark London Borough Council, the local housing authority erred in failing to take into account that the applicant had, in fact, been resident for seven months, had given birth to a child who was a British national, had spent her formative years in the UK and had returned for extended holidays in the three years preceding her arrival, that she had travelled to the UK on a one-way ticket and had family and friends in the UK. All of those factors should have been considered.

Exemptions from the habitual residence test

11.137 The following people are eligible for assistance even if they are not habitually resident:

- an EEA national who is a worker; or
- an EEA national who is self-employed; or
- until 30 June 2018, a person who is an Accession State national subject to worker authorisation who is authorised in accordance with the Accession Regulations 2013 (a Croatian national); or
- a family member of an EEA national who is a worker, a self-employed person, or an Accession State national subject to worker authorisation who is authorised in accordance with the Accession Regulations 2013; or
- a person who has one of certain permanent rights to reside in the UK; or
- a person who is in the UK as a result of having been deported, expelled or otherwise removed by compulsion of law from another country to the UK.

3 The Secretary of State has the power to make regulations to extend this period pursuant to European Union (Croatian Accession and Irish Protocol) Act 2013, s 4. At the time of writing this power had not been exercised and UK Visas and Immigration have indicated that it will not be exercised in future: https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/guidance-for-croatian-nationals-on-getting-permission-to-work-in-the-uk (last accessed on 22 May 2018).

8 SI 2006/1294, reg 6(2)(g); SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 6(2)(f). This group of persons, who are eligible even if not habitually resident, is probably small. The inclusion of this group brings eligibility for homelessness assistance into line with eligibility for housing benefit.

11.138 Most of these exemptions refer to those persons exercising rights of freedom of movement enjoyed under European Union law and contained in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016¹, which are the current regulations transposing European Union freedom of movement legislation into domestic law.

11.139 The penultimate exemption requires some elaboration. This exemption from the habitual residence test only applies to three sub-classes of persons who are entitled to a permanent right of residence¹. Those three sub-classes are:

(1) an EEA national who was a worker or self-employed person who has ceased activity²;

(2) the family member of such an EEA national; and

(3) a person who was:

- the family member of an EEA national who was a worker or self-employed person; and
- the EEA national has died; and
- the family member had resided with the EEA national immediately before his or her death; and
- either the EEA national had resided in the UK for at least two years immediately before his or her death; or
- the death was the result of an accident at work or an occupational disease³.

11.140 ‘Worker or self-employed person who has ceased activity’ is defined at Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, reg 5¹. For ‘family member’, see 11.54–11.60. For ‘worker’, see 11.40–11.49. For ‘self-employed person’ see 11.47–11.49. A person with a permanent right of residence who does not fall within any of these sub-classes set out at 11.139 will have to satisfy the habitual residence test in order to be eligible.

11.141 If an EEA national is¹:

(a) a job-seeker²;

514
Working out whether the applicant is eligible 11.144

(b) a family member of a job-seeker;
(c) only entitled to remain in the UK by virtue of the initial right to reside for three months;
(d) has a derivative right to reside because he or she is the primary carer of a British citizen; or

he or she cannot be eligible. For those EEA nationals who fall within this class the habitual residence test is not relevant: anyone who falls exclusively within this class cannot be eligible for homelessness assistance irrespective of where he or she habitually resides.

7 SI 2006/1294, reg 6(1)(b); SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 6(1)(b). Persons falling within the fourth and fifth categories are not eligible if their applications for homelessness assistance were made to local housing authorities in England on or after 8 November 2012 (SI 2012/2588, reg 3). See letter DCLG to Chief Housing Officers of Local Authorities in England, 17 October 2012, at Appendix 2. Persons falling within these categories applying for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in Wales will not be eligible if the application was made on or after 31 October 2014, SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 8. For applications pre-dating 8 November 2012 (in England) and 31 October 2014 (in Wales) see Pryce v Southwark London Borough Council [2012] EWCA 1572, [2013] 1 WLR 996, [2013] HLR 10, CA.

11.142 So, this second class operates to ensure that any EEA national, or family member of an EEA national, whose only right of residence in the UK is the initial three-month right of residence is not eligible for homelessness assistance.

11.143 It also excludes job-seekers1 from homelessness assistance. EEA nationals who are ‘job-seekers’ are ‘qualified persons’2 and therefore are entitled to the extended right of residence3. If a job-seeker had previously been employed, he or she may still be a ‘worker’ in certain circumstances and is potentially eligible because of the ‘worker’ status. However, if a person’s only claim to the extended right of residence is because of his or her status as a ‘job-seeker’, or as a family member of a job-seeker, he or she will not be eligible.

11.144 For applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 8 November 20124, or to local housing authorities in Wales on or after 31 October 20145, there are two additional exclusions from eligibility.

1 SI 2012/2588, reg 3.

2 SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 8.

11.145 First, a person who is entitled to an EU right of residence that is derived from being the primary carer of a British national is excluded. He or she is also treated as not habitually resident and thus excluded from receiving non-contributory benefits including housing benefit.

He or she is also excluded from eligibility for an allocation of social housing. The ‘derivative right of residence’ which forms the basis of this exclusion was recognised by the CJEU in the case of Zambrano v Office national de l’emploi, and is now identified in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016, see 11.80–11.85. People entitled to any of the four other derivative rights of residence in reg 16 of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2016 do not fall within this second class of people excluded from eligibility.

2 Social Security (Habitual Residence) (Amendment) Regulations 2012, SI 2012/2587, and Universal Credit Regulations 2013, SI 2013/376, reg 9. A challenge to these regulations as discriminatory was unsuccessful in R (Sanneh) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2015] EWCA Civ 49, [2015] HLR 27, CA. That decision was upheld by the Supreme Court in An appeal by one of the Claimants in that case (on another issue) was dismissed by the Supreme Court in R (HC) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2017] UKSC 73, [2017] 3 WLR 1486, SC. There is no exclusion prohibiting the person who has this derivative right of residence from working. However, if the person is not in or cannot work (not least because of his or her caring responsibilities) and the household is destitute, the recourse is likely to be to adult care or children’s services for financial and accommodation assistance. See Chapter 20.

5 C34/09, [2012] QB 265, CJEU.

6 SI 2016/1052, reg 16(5).

11.146 Second, a person who has a right derived from Art 20 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU, in a case where the right to reside arises because a British citizen would otherwise be deprived of the genuine enjoyment of the substance of his or her rights as an EU citizen, is also excluded from eligibility. This new provision appears to exclude those with certain rights of residence arising from Art 20 which have not, as yet, been identified in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations, but which are subsequently declared by the CJEU. Article 20 of the Treaty contains the right of nationals of EU member states to be citizens of the EU and to move and reside freely within the territories of the EU Member States. This provision does not exclude all the rights of EU residence that might, in the future, be recognised in CJEU case-law but simply those that are:

• derived from Art 20 of the Treaty; and
• arise because otherwise a British citizen would be deprived of the genuine enjoyment of the substance of his or her rights under EU law.

2 SI 2016/1052.

11.147 For rights declared by the CJEU, see 11.931.
1 The DCLG has written to Chief Housing Officers of Local Authorities in England in relation to these rights, see letter dated 17 October 2012 at Appendix 2.

11.148 If a person has more than one right of residence, such as being both a job-seeker and being the family member of a worker or self-employed person, then his or her right to reside is not ‘only’ derived from his or her status as a job-seeker, or from any of the other four provisions in this second class, and he or she will not fall within this second class of persons (not subject to immigration control) who are not eligible for homelessness assistance.

The third class: EEA nationals with certain rights to reside in the CTA

11.149 This third class1 refers to an EEA nationals whose only right to reside in the rest of the Common Travel Area arises from:

(a) his or her status a job-seeker;
(b) his or her status as the family member of a job-seeker;
(c) an entitlement to remain in the UK by virtue of the initial right to reside for three months;
(d) having a derivative right to reside because he or she is the primary carer of a British or Irish citizen; or
(e) having a right to reside derived from Art 20 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU, where the right to reside arises because a British or Irish citizen in the Common Travel Area would otherwise be deprived of the genuine enjoyment of the substance of his or her rights as an EU citizen.

An applicant who falls within one of these categories will not be eligible for assistance2.

11.151 The derivative right to reside referred to in this class is not identified in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 20161. It arises as
11.151 Eligibility for Assistance

A result of the CJEU’s decision in Zambrano v Office national de l’emploi. That decision recognized rights of residence which are directly effective in the remainder of the CTA: ie the Channel Islands, Isle of Man and the Republic of Ireland. A person will have this derivative right of residence if he or she is the primary carer of a British citizen residing in the Channels Islands or the Isle of Man, or of an Irish citizen residing in the Republic of Ireland, and the British or Irish citizen would have to leave those countries and would not be able to reside in any other EU member state if his or her primary carer did not have an EU right of residence.

2 C34/09, [2012] QB 265, CJEU.

11.152 The exclusion from eligibility for homelessness assistance for those people exercising the derivative right of residence or other rights of residence derived from Art 20 applies to applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 8 November 2012¹ and to local housing authorities in Wales on or after 31 October 2014².

1 SI 2012/2588, reg 3.
2 SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 8.

11.153 As with the second class, if a person has more than one right of residence, then his or her right to reside is not ‘only’ derived from his or her status as a jobseeker, or from the other four provisions in this class, and he or she will not fall within this third class of persons (not subject to immigration control) who are not eligible for homelessness assistance.

FURTHER RULES ON ELIGIBILITY

Disregard of ineligible members of the household

Overview

11.154 Even if an applicant is eligible for assistance, not all of the members of his or her household will necessarily also be eligible. HA 1996, s 185(4) and H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(5) provide that, for certain applicants, any member of his or her household who is not eligible for assistance must be disregarded when the local housing authority is considering whether the applicant is homeless or threatened with homelessness, or whether the applicant has a priority need¹.

¹ HA 1996, s 185(4); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(5).

11.155 HA 1996, s 185(4) as originally enacted was declared incompatible with the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Art 14¹. The reason was because its wording at that time provided for a difference in treatment between applicants on the grounds of national origin or on grounds of a combination of one or more of nationality, immigration control, settled residence or social welfare, and that difference in treatment could prevent the applicant and his or her child from being able to enjoy their right to respect for their home and family life (Art 8) and was therefore discriminatory (Art 14). In the context of a British citizen with a young dependent child who was subject to immigration control, the court found that the difference in treatment was not justified. However, until the government took action to remedy the incompatibility, local housing authorities were required to continue to operate HA 1996, s 185(4). The changes to the law made necessary by the judgment came into force in both England and Wales on 2 March 2009 and applied to applications for homelessness assistance made on or after that date.

3. The rules affecting Wales have since been reenacted in H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(5) and (6).
4. HA 1996, s 185(4) and (5) as amended and inserted by s 314 and Sch 15 Housing and Regeneration Act 2008.

11.156 Some two and a half years after the new rules came into force, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) considered the same question in the context of an applicant from Sierra Leone with indefinite leave to remain whose dependent son had been granted leave to come to the UK on the express proviso that he should have no recourse to public funds. The issue was whether the previous rules (and, by implication, the current rules) violated an applicant’s right to respect for his or her private and family life and home (Art 8) and was discriminatory (contrary to Art 14). The ECtHR found that there was differential treatment between applicants who rely for priority need status on people who are in the UK unlawfully or subject to a condition that they do not have recourse to public funds, and those applicants who rely for priority need on people not subject to the same immigration restriction. It found that the differential treatment was reasonably and objectively justified by the need to allocate the scarce stock of social housing available and that it could be legitimate when allocating social housing to have regard to the immigration status of those who are in need of social housing. Accordingly there was no violation of Art 14 taken in conjunction with Art 8.

1. The change to the rules as a result of the decision in R (Morris) v Westminster City Council [2005] EWCA 1184, [2006] HLR 8, CA did not extent to applicants, such as Ms Bah, from outside of the EEA and Switzerland.
2. Bah v UK App No 56328/07 [2011] ECHR 1448, [2012] HLR 2, ECtHR. The current rules were subject to a challenge by means of an application to the ECtHR in the case of Ijaola-Jokesenu v UK, App no 45996/11 [2012] ECHR 652, (2012) September Legal Action, p 29. However, the claim was struck out following an agreed settlement between the parties and the ECtHR did not adjudicate on the merits of the case. See (2014) November Legal Action, p 41.

The rules on disregarding household members

11.157 The current rules came into force on 2 March 2009 and apply to applications for homelessness assistance made on or after that date to local housing authorities in England and in Wales. They are found at HA 1996, s 185(4) and (5) and H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(5) and (6). Neither Code of Guidance contains any guidance on the subject.

1. Applications to local housing authorities in England after 2 March 2009 will be dealt with under HA 1996, s 185(4) and (5). Applications to local housing authorities in Wales after 2 March 2009 but before 27 April 2015 will be dealt with under HA 1996, s 185(4) and (5). Applications to local housing authorities in Wales after 31 October 2014 will be dealt with under H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, paras 1(5) and (6). This distinction is a technical one: there is no substantive difference between the provisions under HA 1996 and H(W)A 2014.
11.157 Eligibility for Assistance

As amended by Housing and Regeneration Act 2008, s 314 and Sch 15.

The disregard where the applicant is a person subject to immigration control

11.158 For applications to local housing authorities made on or after 2 March 2009\(^1\), this disregard of non-eligible household members only applies where the eligible applicant is:

- subject to immigration control\(^2\);
- eligible as a result of falling within one of the classes of people prescribed as eligible by Regulation\(^3\); and
- not a national of an EEA state or of Switzerland\(^4\).

\(^1\) The date applies to applications to local housing authorities in both England and Wales (Housing and Regeneration Act 2008, s 314 and Sch 15).

\(^2\) See 11.26–11.93.

\(^3\) For applications to local housing authorities in England, the classes are Classes A–G at Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (England) 2006, SI 2006/1294, reg 5(1). For applications to local housing authorities in Wales, the classes are Classes A–G at Allocation of Housing and Homelessness (Eligibility) (Wales) 2014, SI 2014/2603 (W 257), reg 5(1). See 11.106–11.121.

\(^4\) HA 1996, s 184(5); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(6).

11.159 If the applicant has all of those characteristics, any ineligible members of his or her household must be disregarded when the local housing authority is considering whether the applicant is homeless or threatened with homelessness, or whether the applicant has a priority need\(^1\). For example, when a local housing authority is considering whether overcrowded accommodation is reasonable for the applicant and his or her household to continue to occupy for the purpose of deciding whether the applicant is homeless or threatened with homelessness, ineligible members of the household cannot be considered. Even more importantly, if an applicant’s children or other family members are all persons from abroad and ineligible for assistance, they cannot provide the applicant with a priority need\(^2\).

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 185(4); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(5).

\(^2\) R (Morris) v Westminster City Council [2005] EWCA 1184, [2006] HLR 8, CA. This rule was challenged by means of an application to the ECtHR in the case of Ijaola-jokesenumi v UK, App no 45996/11 [2012] ECHR 652, (2012) September Legal Action, p 29. However, the claim was struck out following an agreed settlement between the parties and the ECtHR did not adjudicate on the merits of the case. See (2014) November Legal Action, p 41.

11.160 It does not follow, however, that those members of an applicant’s household who are not eligible are to be disregarded for all purposes. When it comes to the discharge of the local housing authority’s duty by the provision of suitable accommodation, that accommodation must be suitable for the needs of the applicant and his or her household, even if the household includes persons who are not eligible for assistance\(^1\).

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 176; H(W)A 2014, s 56.

11.161 In addition, local authorities have a range of other statutory duties and powers under which they may provide accommodation, particularly where there are dependent children\(^1\). If a household is caught by HA 1996, s 185(4) or H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(5), and none of any dependent children or other vulnerable members are eligible and so cannot confer a priority need, local authorities may consider using those other statutory duties and powers in order to provide accommodation. But they may not do so simply with the object of circumventing the restriction in HA 1996, s 185(4) or H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, para 1(5).

1 See CHAPTER 20.
2 R (Badu) v Lambeth London Borough Council [2005] EWCA Civ 1184, [2006] HLR 8, CA; and see CHAPTER 20 for the range of statutory powers and duties available to local authorities.

Disregard abolished where the applicant is not a person subject to immigration control

11.162 The disregard of ineligible household members does not apply if the applicant is not a person subject to immigration control. The applicant will be entitled to have the whole of his or her household assessed for the purposes of determining whether he or she is homeless and whether he or she has a priority need, irrespective of the immigration status of the people in his or her household.

1 HA 1996, s 185(4) and (5); H(W)A 2014, Sch 2, paras 1(5) and (6). See 11.26–11.93.

11.163 However, if there are ineligible members of an applicant’s household in those circumstances, the ineligible members are known as ‘restricted persons’ and, in some circumstances, the duty owed to the applicant may be modified as a result of that person’s presence in the household. For applications to a local housing authority in England made on or after 9 November 2012, the modifications are less significant than prior to that date, as a result of the amendments to HA 1996, s 193 made by the Localism Act 2011, ss 148–149. These amendments did not take effect in Wales but the coming into force of H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 on 27 April 2015 has had the same effect.

1 HA 1996, s 184(7); H(W)A 2014, s 63(5). For the duties owed to ‘restricted cases’ by local housing authorities, see 16.180–16.185 (England) and 17.177 (Wales). See English Code, paras 7.25–7.28 and Welsh Code, paras 15.73–15.74.

11.164 A ‘restricted person’ is defined as a person:

• who is not eligible for assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2; and
• who is subject to immigration control within the meaning of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996; and
• who either does not have leave to enter or remain in the UK; or
• whose leave to enter or remain in the UK is subject to a condition to maintain and accommodate himself or herself, and any dependents, without recourse to public funds.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 See 11.26–11.93.
11.165 Eligibility for Assistance

11.165 If the applicant is owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty\(^1\) (in England) or the H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty\(^2\) (in Wales) and that duty is only owed to the applicant because of the presence in his or her household of a restricted person, the local housing authority has additional notification duties\(^3\). It must notify the applicant that the main housing duty, or H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty, is owed on the basis of the restricted person’s presence in the applicant’s household, must name the restricted person, must explain why that person is a restricted person, and must explain the effects of the modifications to the relevant duty. In those circumstances, the applicant’s case becomes known as ‘a restricted case’\(^4\).

11.166 The mere presence of a restricted person in an applicant’s household is not sufficient for the applicant’s case to become a restricted case. The applicant’s case only becomes a restricted case if the presence of the restricted person has either:

• caused the applicant to become homeless or threatened with homelessness\(^5\); or

• caused the applicant to have a priority need.

3 HA 1996, s 184(3A); H(W)A 2014, s 63(2). See 9.54–9.56.
4 HA 1996, s 193(3B); H(W)A 2014, s 76(5). See English Code, para 7.25.

11.167 If the applicant would have been homeless or threatened with homelessness, and/or had a priority need, whether or not he or she had the restricted person in his or her household, his or her case will not be a restricted case.

Duties owed to restricted cases

11.168 Since the amendments to HA 1996, s 193 made by Localism Act 2011, s 148, which apply to applications for homelessness assistance made to a local housing authority in England on or after 9 November 2012\(^1\), and the coming into force of H(W)A 2014, which applies to applications for homelessness assistance made to a local housing authority in Wales on or after 27 April 2015, the distinction between restricted cases and other applicants has become less significant. This is because HA 1996, Pt 7\(^6\) and H(W)A Pt 2 both now allow for the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty (in England) and the H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty (in Wales) to be brought to an end by a private rented sector offer in any case, irrespective of the eligibility of the members of the applicant’s household\(^1\). The increased recourse to the private rented sector which the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017\(^7\) seeks to promote is likely to reduce the significance of the distinction between restricted cases and other
Further rules on eligibility 11.170

11.169 If an applicant is a ‘restricted case’, the local housing authority is required to bring the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty (in England) or the H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty (in Wales) to an end by making a private rented sector offer, so far as is reasonably practicable. Any regulations made by the Secretary of State in respect of England, specifying a minimum period greater than 12 months for a private rented sector offer need not apply to restricted cases, so if, in a regulation in the future, a longer minimum period is specified for most applicants in England owed the main housing duty, restricted cases may still be made a private rented sector offer of a 12-month fixed-term tenancy.

11.170 A further distinction which applies only to applications made in England is that an applicant who is a restricted case need not have been informed in writing of the effect under HA 1996, s 195A of a further application to a local housing authority within two years of acceptance of a private rented sector offer. This is because the special provisions at HA 1996, s 195A, which provide for the interim accommodation duty at HA 1996, s 188 and/or the main housing duty at HA 1996, s 193 to be owed regardless of whether the applicant has a priority need, do not apply where the main housing duty would not apply without having regard to the presence of a restricted person in the applicant’s household. Under H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, there is no equivalent provision to HA 1996, s 195A and so these issues do not arise in respect of applications for homelessness assistance made in Wales.
11.171 Eligibility for Assistance

11.171 The wording of HA 1996, s 195A\(^1\) is somewhat confusing. It provides that if the local housing authority would not have been satisfied that the applicant was homeless and eligible and had not become homeless intentionally had it not had ‘regard to a restricted person’, then the special provisions do not apply and the applicant must also have a priority need in order to be entitled to the main housing duty. So if an applicant would have been unintentionally homeless and eligible for assistance whether or not a restricted person was in his or her household, he or she will still be entitled to the special provisions and to the main housing duty without having to show a priority need. From the wording of the subsection, it appears that it is only if the presence of the restricted person has rendered the applicant homeless\(^2\), that the applicant would also need to have a priority need in order to be entitled to the main housing duty.

\(^1\) As amended by HRA 2017, s 4(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

\(^2\) Perhaps because the arrival of the restricted person has made the accommodation overcrowded and unreasonable to occupy or because his or her presence has resulted in the landlord requiring possession.

11.172 If the applicant who makes a further application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England within two years of the date of his or her acceptance of a private rented sector offer is only entitled to the main housing duty because of the presence in his or her household of a restricted person, he or she will again be regarded as a ‘restricted case’\(^1\). The modifications to the main housing duty will apply and the local housing authority will be required, so far as is reasonably practicable, to make a private rented sector offer to the applicant\(^2\), and will not be required to notify him or her of the special provision at HA 1996, s 195A\(^3\).

The Isles of Scilly

11.173 The Isles of Scilly are administratively part of England\(^1\), but special measures have been taken to protect the very limited stock of social housing on those islands. HA 1996\(^2\) enables the Secretary of State to make an order adapting HA 1996, Pt 7\(^3\) in its application to the Isles of Scilly and that power has been used to make special provisions governing eligibility for applicants applying for homelessness assistance there\(^4\).

11.174 The order amends HA 1996, ss 183–218\(^1\), to provide that a person is not eligible for homelessness assistance from the authorities in the Isles of Scilly unless he or she has been resident in the district of the Isles of Scilly for a total period of two years and six months during the period of three years...

   The statutory categories in H(W)A 2014, s 70 12.195

INTRODUCTION

12.1 For the large part of the four decades following the enactment of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, the question of whether or not an applicant had a priority need was of central importance to the determination of his or her homelessness application and the help which he or she would receive in consequence of this determination. The answer to that question dictated whether or not the help provided to the applicant might be restricted to the provision of advice and assistance, often limited in extent and variable in quality\(^1\), or might extend to having accommodation secured for his or her occupation. As Crisis put it:

The Housing (Homeless Persons) Act (1977) made local authorities responsible for the long-term rehousing of some groups of homeless people for the first time. The Act defined which groups of homeless people were considered to have a 'priority need' and therefore might be owed a statutory duty to be secured settled accommodation by local authorities. This is commonly referred to as the ‘main homelessness duty’. The 1977 Act ushered in a transformative legal change for many homeless people but also created a longstanding distinction between those defined as priority need who are owed the main homelessness duty (predominantly families with dependent children) and those who are not (predominantly single people, including couples without dependent children).

\(^1\) See Turned Away (Crisis, 2014).
\(^2\) The homelessness legislation: an independent review of the legal duties owed to homeless people (Crisis, 2015), p 8. This review contained the draft legislation which went on to form the basis of the Homelessness Reduction Bill, introduced to Parliament by means of a Private Member’s Bill by Bob Blackman MP.

12.2 It was this ‘longstanding distinction’ which the Housing (Wales) Act 2014\(^4\) (H(W)A 2014), Pt 2 and the amendments to the Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996), Pt 7 made by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017\(^2\) (HRA 2017) sought to address. One of the stated aims of the H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 was to ‘extend the help available to people by improving services for those who are...
12.2 Priority Need not in priority need’. Likewise, the HRA 2017, the drafting of which was modelled on H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, was intended to ‘create a more robust package of advice and assistance to prevent and relieve homelessness for all applicants regardless of priority need status’.

4 The homelessness legislation: an independent review of the legal duties owed to homeless people (Crisis, 2015), p 20. See 12.1 fn 3.

12.3 The legislation sought to achieve this by means of two separate duties owed to any applicant who is eligible for assistance and either threatened with homelessness or homeless, irrespective of whether he or she has a priority need. Respectively these are:

- the HA 1996, s 195(2) and H(W)A 2014, s 66 prevention duty to take reasonable steps to help the applicant secure that suitable accommodation does not cease to be available for his or her occupation;
- the HA 1996, s 189B(2) and H(W)A 2014, s 73 relief duty to take reasonable steps to help the applicant secure that suitable accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation.

1 HA 1996, s 195(2) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2017, s 66(1). See 15.87–15.137 and 17.45–17.72.

2 HA 1996, s 189B(2) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2017, s 73(1). See 15.138–15.189 and 17.73–17.117.

12.4 As a consequence, the question of whether or not an applicant for homelessness assistance has a priority need is of less significance for applicants for homelessness assistance than it used to be. However, despite the fact that applicants who do not have a priority need should now receive rather more effective help than used to be the case, the question of whether or not the applicant has a priority need remains a significant one and will still need to be addressed in most, if not all, cases. The complex body of rules which dictate whether or not an applicant has a priority need form the subject of this chapter.

When and why it matters

12.5 To understand when and why the question of priority need may (or may not) be significant it helps to consider the application and decision making process in stages.
The application stage

12.6 At the outset of an application for homelessness assistance, the local housing authority must take a preliminary view about priority need. If the local housing authority has reason to believe that the applicant may have a priority need and may also be homeless and eligible, it must provide interim accommodation while it works out what duty under HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 (if any) the applicant is owed. The threshold for the provision of interim accommodation is very low; any ‘reason to believe’ that an applicant may have a priority need is sufficient. There have been findings of maladministration against local housing authorities which turned away applicants, telling them to obtain medical evidence, and, as a result, failed to discharge their duty to provide interim accommodation. The burden of making inquiries rests on the local housing authority; it is not for the applicant to have to prove his or her case.

1 HA 1996, s 188(1)–(1ZB) as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(4)(a) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, s 68(1) and (2). See also Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities (Ministry of Housing, Communities and Local Government, February 2018) (the English Code), paras 15.4–15.6, at Appendix 2 of this book and Code of Guidance for Local Authorities on the Allocation of Accommodation and Homelessness (Welsh Government, March 2016), para 11.3, on the CD Rom with this book. The interim duties are more fully discussed at 16.37–16.73 and 17.118–17.133.

The decision stage

12.7 There are various decisions which a local housing authority may need to make in the course of considering a homelessness application and we will consider each of the possible decisions in the order in which they may arise. A local housing authority will not necessarily need to make all of these decisions in every case. Much will depend upon the applicant’s situation at the time he or she makes his or her application for homelessness assistance and the effectiveness of the help provided by the local housing authority following his or her application. But a local housing authority will have to make at least one of these decisions following the receipt of an application for homelessness assistance.
12.8 Priority Need

The first decision – whether or not the prevention duty is owed

12.8 The HA 1996, s 195(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 66 prevention duty will be owed to any applicant who is threatened with homelessness and eligible for assistance, irrespective of whether he or she has a priority need. In deciding whether or not this duty is owed, the local housing authority is not required to consider whether or not the applicant has a priority need. However, if the applicant is owed this duty then the local housing authority must also make an assessment of his or her case with a view to identifying what steps should be taken to help the applicant to retain his or her accommodation. In practice, this assessment is likely to involve some consideration of the matters relevant to whether or not the applicant has a priority need.

1 HA 1996, s 195(2) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2017, s 66(1). See 15.87–15.137 and 17.45–17.72.

The second decision – whether or not the relief duty is owed 12.9 The HA 1996, s 189B(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 73 relief duty will be owed to any applicant who is homeless and eligible for assistance, irrespective of whether he or she has a priority need. In deciding whether or not this duty is owed, the local housing authority is not required to consider whether or not the applicant has a priority need. However, if the applicant is owed this duty then the local housing authority must also make an assessment of his or her case with a view to identifying what steps should be taken to help the applicant to secure accommodation. In practice, this assessment is likely to involve some consideration of the matters relevant to whether or not the applicant has a priority need.

1 HA 1996, s 189B(2) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2017, s 73(1). See 15.133–15.189 and 17.73–17.117.
2 See Chapter 10.
3 See Chapter 11.
4 HA 1996, s 189A(2) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, s 62(1) and (5). See 15.62–15.86 and 9.13.

The third decision – what duty is owed after the relief duty comes to an end

12.10 The question of whether the applicant has a priority need will assume critical importance in those cases where the applicant has been found to be homeless and eligible for assistance, but the HA 1996, s 189B(2) or H(W)A 2014, s 73 relief duty has come to an end and the applicant has not yet been successful in obtaining accommodation. In these cases the question of what, if any, duty the applicant will be owed next will turn on whether he or she has a priority need.

1 HA 1996, s 189B(2) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2017, s 73(1). See 15.138–15.189 and 17.73–17.117.

12.11 If the applicant has a priority need, did not become homeless intentionally and is still homeless (England) or without suitable accommodation available to him or her which is likely to remain available for at least six months (Wales), then the HA 1996, s 193(2), main housing duty or the H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty will be owed, providing that the relief duty did not come to an end by reason of certain specified acts or omissions on the part of the applicant. This means that the local housing authority must secure that accommodation is available for the applicant’s occupation. The Welsh Code describes this function as a ‘safety net for those applicants deemed to be most in need’.

1 See CHAPTER 13.

2 HA 1996, s 193(2); H(W)A 2014, s 75(1). See 16.94–16.199 and 17.146–17.197. Note that for applicants for homelessness assistance to local housing authorities in Wales, the local housing authority will only consider whether the applicant has become homeless intentionally where the decision making process set out at 13.252–13.255 has been followed. Otherwise the local housing authority will not consider this issue and the applicant will be owed the H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty irrespective of whether he or she became homeless intentionally: see H(W)A 2014, s 75(1) and (2).

3 Specifically, in relation to applications for homelessness assistance made to a local housing authority in England, the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty will not apply where the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) has come to an end by reason of the applicant refusing a ‘final accommodation offer’ (defined by HA 1996, s 193A(4) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) or a ‘final Pt 6 offer’ (defined by HA 1996, s 193A(5) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) or where notice has been given under HA 1996, s 193B(2) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) that the applicant has deliberately and unreasonably refused to take any step recorded in his or her personal plan (as inserted by HRA 1996, s 189A (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 3(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018). See HA 1996, s 193C(1A) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018). In relation to applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in Wales, the H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty will not apply where the relief duty has come to an end by virtue of H(W)A 2014, s 74(5) as a result of the applicant refusing an offer of suitable accommodation. See H(W)A 2015, s 75(1).

4 Welsh Code, para 16.2.

12.12 For applicants to local housing authorities in England where the applicant has a priority need and did not become homeless intentionally, but the relief duty came to an end by virtue of HA 1996, s 193C(2) after notice was given under HA 1996, s 193B(2) that the applicant had deliberately and unreasonably refused to take any step recorded in his or her personal plan, the HA 1996, s 193C(2) main housing duty will not apply. Instead the applicant will be owed the duty at HA 1996, s 193C(4). This means that the local housing authority will be required to secure that accommodation is available for occupation by the applicant. In practice this is very similar to the HA 1996, s 193C(4) main housing duty. This distinction lies in the different ways in which the two duties may be brought to an end¹.
12.12 Priority Need

¹ As inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

12.13 If the applicant has a priority need but became homeless intentionally then, if the application was made to a local housing authority in England, the local housing authority must secure that accommodation is available for the applicant's occupation for such period as they consider will give him or her a reasonable opportunity of securing accommodation, and secure that he or she is provided with advice and assistance in any attempts he or she may make to secure that accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation². Alternatively, if the application was made to a local housing authority in Wales, the local housing authority will owe no further duty³. If the applicant does not have a priority need then no further duty will be owed.

³ Note that H(W)A 2014, s 75(3) is not yet in force. According to the Welsh Code, para 14.8 it is anticipated that this section will be brought into force in 2019. When this happens the duty to secure accommodation under H(W)A 2014, s 75(3) to those applicants who have a priority need who became homeless intentionally will be extended. See 17.2.

12.14 In England, the local housing authority is not, at this stage, concerned with whether the applicant had a priority need at the date of application, but rather with whether she or he has a priority need at the date of the decision as to what (if any) HA 1996, Pt 7¹ duty is, or will be, owed once the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief² duty comes to an end. If there has been a change of circumstances between the making of the application and the date of the decision, the local housing authority must take that change into account. In one case, which reached the Court of Appeal, the applicant had had a priority need at the date of application and for the following six days, but not at the date of the decision³.

¹ As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

² HA 1996, s 189B(2) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018). See 15.138–15.189.

12.15 The question for the local housing authority is whether, at the date of its decision (or, if a review has been requested, at the date of the review decision) the applicant has a priority need⁴. The local housing authority must not improperly delay making its decision (or concluding its review) in order to see whether the applicant might meanwhile lose an apparent priority need. It is not at all unusual for an applicant to have one form of priority need at the date of application (eg pregnancy) and another at the date of decision or review (eg a dependent child).

12.16 In contrast, the position for local housing authorities in Wales varies according to which category of priority need the applicant falls within. Where priority need status is dependent on establishing that the applicant is between 16 and 21 years old, then the local housing authority must rely on his or her age at the date of application. Otherwise the position is the same as under HA 1996, Pt 7: the applicant’s status must be considered as of the time of the decision as to what duty, if any, is or will be, owed to him or her following the performance of the relief duty.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(f), (g) and (h). See 12.212–12.213, 12.214–12.216 and 12.217–12.219 respectively. This avoids the situation whereby a young person loses priority need status as a result of unavoidable delay in processing his or her application.
2 Welsh Code, paras 16.40 and 16.46.
3 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
4 H(W)A 2014, s 73(1). See 17.73–17.117.

After the decision

12.17 Once the local housing authority has reached a decision that the applicant has a priority need and has identified what duty it therefore owes to the applicant, that duty will not be displaced by any later change in the applicant’s priority need (unless a review has been sought and the change takes place between the original decision and conclusion of the review). The schemes of HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 do not permit a concluded duty to be re-opened simply because priority need is later lost. Once a duty has been accepted, save for very limited exceptions, the duty continues until it is discharged.

2 Such as where fraud or deception on the part of the applicant has been discovered. See 9.143 and 16.103.

12.18 However, the manner in which the local housing authority’s duty to the applicant is performed may be affected if priority need is lost. An obvious example would be where the applicant is provided with temporary four-bedroom accommodation because four dependent children, who are residing with him or her, confer a priority need. If those children all leave, the local housing authority will be entitled to perform its duty by providing smaller accommodation.
12.19 Priority Need

On a new application

12.19 If the applicant has been owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty or H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty and that duty ends, the applicant may apply again. It is quite irrelevant that the applicant had a priority need on his or her earlier application. What is important is whether she or he may have a priority need at the date of the new application and at the date of the decision on that new application.

1 See 16.94–16.199.
2 See 17.146–17.197.
3 HA 1996, s 193(9). See 8.77–8.91. There is no equivalent provision in H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, but the only limit which is placed on further applications in contained in H(W)A 2014, s 62(2).

12.20 If the applicant was not owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty or the H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty on the initial application (because she or he had no priority need) but has now applied again, it will be critically important whether she or he has since acquired a priority need. Subsequently acquiring a priority need may constitute a change of the factual position so that the local housing authority is required to entertain and inquire into the new application.

12.21 An applicant whose earlier application for homelessness assistance was made to a local housing authority in England on or after 9 November 2012, who had accepted a private rented sector offer, and who subsequently makes a fresh application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England within two years of the date of accepting the offer, will generally not need to have a priority need in order to be entitled to the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty again. He or she will still have to be homeless, eligible for assistance, and the local housing authority not be satisfied that he or she became homeless intentionally in order to be entitled to that duty. The exception is where a local housing authority in England is only satisfied that the applicant is homeless or eligible for assistance, and is not satisfied that he or she became homeless intentionally, as a result of the presence in his or her household of a ‘restricted person’. Where that is the case, the applicant must still have a priority need in order to be entitled to the main housing duty. Generally, it will be the very presence of the restricted person in the applicant’s household that will give the applicant a priority need.

3 As defined at HA 1996, s 184(7). See 11.163–11.164.

Overview of the statutory scheme 12.26

OVERVIEW OF THE STATUTORY SCHEME

England

12.22 The concept and definition of ‘priority need’ was first given statutory expression in the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 and is now found in very similar (but not precisely the same) terms in HA 1996, s 189(1). HA 1996, Pt 71 sets out four different categories. If the applicant falls into any one of the four categories, he or she has a priority need.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

12.23 Those categories are:

• a pregnant woman or a person with whom she resides or might reasonably be expected to reside1;
• a person with whom dependent children reside or might reasonably be expected to reside2;
• a person who is vulnerable as a result of old age, mental illness or mental handicap or physical disability or other special reason, or with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside3; and
• a person who is homeless or threatened with homelessness as a result of an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster4.

12.24 Each of these four categories is examined in more detail at 12.37–12.131.

12.25 The Secretary of State is given powers under HA 1996, Pt 71, to specify further categories of priority need and to amend or repeal any part of the four statutory categories. For more than 20 years, the statutory categories remained unchanged. In 2002, however, further categories were added by the Secretary of State.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 HA 1996, s 189(2).

12.26 The Homelessness (Priority Need for Accommodation) (England) Order 20025, made by the Secretary of State, came into force from 31 July 2002. It adds six additional categories to those at HA 1996, s 189(1). In summary they cover:

(1) a child aged 16 or 17, subject to exceptions6;
(2) a young person under 21, who has been looked after, accommodated or fostered, but who is not a student in full-time education7;
(3) a person over 21 who is vulnerable as a result of having been looked after, accommodated or fostered8;

1 HA 1996, s 189(1)(a).
2 HA 1996, s 189(1)(b).
3 HA 1996, s 189(1)(c).
4 HA 1996, s 189(1)(d).
5 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
6 HA 1996, s 189(2).
12.26 Priority Need

(4) a person who is vulnerable as a result of having served in the armed forces;
(5) a person who is vulnerable as a result of having been imprisoned; and
(6) a person who is vulnerable as a result of ceasing to occupy accommodation because of actual or threatened violence.

1 SI 2002/2051.
2 SI 2002/2051, art 3. Since the making of this Order, both case-law and government guidance have directed that a homeless child in these circumstances will generally be considered ‘a child in need’ (Children Act 1989, s 20) so a duty to secure accommodation will be owed by a children’s services authority. Most importantly, the guidance emphasises that local housing authorities and children’s services authorities should work together and co-operate in order to meet the accommodation and other needs of children and young people. See 12.133–12.159.

12.27 Each of these six categories is examined in more detail at 12.133–12.194.

12.28 The English Code has a separate chapter giving guidance on the priority need categories applicable to local housing authorities in England.

1 English Code, chapter 8.

Wales

12.29 In Wales, the categories of priority need are contained wholly in H(W)A 2014, s 70. In summary, the 10 categories are:

- a pregnant woman or a person with whom she resides or might reasonably be expected to reside;
- a person with whom a dependent child resides or might reasonably be expected to reside;
- a person who is vulnerable as a result of some special reason (eg old age, physical or mental illness or physical or mental disability) or a person with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside;
- a person who is homeless or threatened with homelessness as a result of an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster or a person with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside;
- a person who is homeless as a result of being subject to domestic abuse or a person with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside;
- a 16- or 17-year-old (at the time of application), or a person with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside;
- a young person aged 18, 19 or 20 (at the time of application), who is at particular risk of sexual or financial exploitation, or a person with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside;
- a young person aged 18, 19 or 20 (at the time of application), who has been looked after, accommodated or fostered, or a person with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside;
Overview of the statutory scheme 12.32

- a person who is homeless after leaving the armed forces, or a person with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside; and
- a person who is vulnerable as a result of having been imprisoned, or a person with whom such a person resides or might reasonably be expected to reside.

12.30 Each of these categories is examined in more detail at 12.197–12.228. The Welsh Code has a separate chapter giving guidance on the priority need categories applicable in Wales.

1 Welsh Code, chapter 16.

How do the categories work?

12.31 An applicant may acquire a priority need in one of two ways: (1) by reliance on their own personal circumstances; or (2) in some cases, by reliance on the personal circumstances of others. The statutory categories make the available routes clear.

12.32 For local housing authorities in England, in some cases, the applicant will only acquire a priority need if he or she personally meets the qualifying conditions. For example, if priority need arises from homelessness caused by an emergency, it must be the applicant who has been personally rendered homeless by the emergency. For those cases there is no mechanism whereby another member of the applicant’s household who falls within one of those priority need categories could confer priority need upon the applicant. In that situation, the proper course is for the application to be made by any person who does fall within any of those categories. Any housing duty he or she is owed will be met by accommodation being provided to all members of his or her household (including non-priority members). For example, if a childless couple is considering making an application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England, and one of the two is vulnerable as a result of having been in care, having served in the armed forces, or having been imprisoned, it is that person who should be the applicant.

2 HA 1996, s 176; H(W)A 2014, s 56. See R (Ogbeni) v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council [2008] EWHC 2444 (Admin), (2008) October Legal Action, p 37, Admin Ct, where a 17-year-old applicant had a priority need and was entitled to the main housing duty. The local housing authority was required to secure accommodation for both him and his aunt, who had normally resided with him as a member of his family.
12.33 Priority Need

12.33 For other cases for local housing authorities in England, and all cases for local housing authorities in Wales, the applicant may acquire priority need as a result of another person’s circumstances. For example, in both jurisdictions, when it comes to pregnancy or the statutory category of vulnerability, the applicant will be in priority need either if he or she personally is in that condition or if it applies to any person with whom the applicant resides or might reasonably be expected to reside.

12.34 If the applicant is a person subject to immigration control¹ who is eligible for assistance² and is not a British or EEA national, and if the applicant has (or may have) a priority need only because a person with whom he or she resides, or might reasonably be expected to reside, is pregnant, vulnerable or a dependent child, that person must be ‘eligible’ for assistance³. Otherwise the person is invisible, for the purposes of assessing priority need, to the local housing authority⁴.

12.35 If the applicant has a priority need only because of the presence in his or her household of a ‘restricted person’¹, the applicant is known as a ‘restricted case’². All applicants whose applications for homelessness assistance were made on or after 9 November 2012 to a local housing authority in England, or on or after 27 April 2015 to a local housing authority in Wales, can be made private rented sector offers³. And the amendments made to HA 1996, Pt 7 by HRA 2017⁴ increase further the scope for the duties owed to applicants for homelessness assistance to local authorities in England to be discharged by means of the applicant being helped to secure accommodation in the private sector⁵. However, HA 1996, s 193(7AD) and H(W)A 2014, s 76(5) require a local housing authority to make an applicant who is a restricted case a ‘private rented sector offer’ so far as reasonably practicable.

1 As defined at HA 1996, s 184(7) and H(W)A 2014, s 63(5). See 11.163–11.164.

ENGLAND

The statutory categories in Housing Act 1996, s 189(1)

12.36 These categories apply to applicants to local housing authorities in England.
Pregnancy

12.37 It is a question of fact whether an applicant, or someone who resides with or might reasonably be expected to reside with him or her, is pregnant at the date of the local housing authority’s decision. The length of the pregnancy is not an issue. Nor is the age of the pregnant woman.

1 HA 1996, s 189(1)(a).
2 English Code, para 8.5.

12.38 It is for the local housing authority to undertake such sensitive inquiries as it considers necessary to satisfy itself whether a woman is pregnant. It is not for the applicant to prove pregnancy in any particular way (or at all). Obviously, as the English Code advises, the normal confirmation of pregnancy issued by a GP or midwife should be accepted as sufficient evidence of pregnancy.

1 English Code, para 8.5.

12.39 If the pregnant woman is not herself the applicant, the applicant will have a priority need if he or she resides with the pregnant woman or might reasonably be expected to reside with her. This would include the non-pregnant partner in a couple who had not previously lived together, but who now, in the light of the pregnancy, intend to do so. In those circumstances, it is for the local housing authority to determine whether such a couple might reasonably be expected to reside together, although it might be thought manifestly reasonable if the partner is the father of the expected child. Self-evidently, both same sex and different sex couples can fall within this statutory definition.

1 A single man argued that this category discriminated against single men by giving preferential treatment to women who are pregnant. A County Court judge and subsequently a Court of Appeal judge dismissed the argument. The preferential treatment given to pregnant women is justified by their particular vulnerability while pregnant and by society’s need to protect unborn children: Thorburne v Oxford City Council [2010] EWCA Civ 957, (2010) October Legal Action, p 32, CA.

12.40 If the pregnancy ends before the decision is made, there will be no priority need under this category, although local housing authorities are advised to consider whether the woman is vulnerable for some other special reason where there has been a miscarriage or termination. Conversely, if the pregnancy ends after the decision has been made, the local housing authority will continue to owe its acknowledged duty towards the applicant, whether or not a child has been born. There is an obligation on the applicant to notify any relevant change of circumstance occurring during the assessment process.

1 English Code, para 8.5.
2 HA 1996, s 214(2).

Dependent child or children

12.41 Dependent children cannot be applicants for homelessness assistance in their own right. Where an application is made which involves dependent children, the question for the local housing authority is whether the applicant is someone with whom dependent children reside or with whom they might reasonably be expected to reside.
12.41 Priority Need

1 HA 1996, s 189(1)(b).

12.42 That question itself breaks down into several parts:

(1) Is there a ‘child’ or ‘children’?
(2) Is that child, or are those children, ‘dependent’?
(3) Does the dependent child, or do the dependent children, reside with the applicant?
(4) If not, might that child or those children be reasonably expected to reside with the applicant?

12.43 Advice on this priority need category is set out in the English Code, paras 10.6–10.11.

12.44 It is no part of the statutory requirement that the dependent children are the applicant’s children. The English Code makes this plain: ‘dependent children need not necessarily be the applicant’s own children’. The Code does suggest that there must be something in the nature of a parent/child relationship, referring to adoptive, foster or step relationships. However, nothing in HA 1996, Pt 7, requires a relationship of this nature or any form of relationship between the applicant and the dependent child.

1 English Code, para 8.8.
2 English Code, para 8.8.
3 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

‘Children’

12.45 HA 1996, Pt 7 does not specify an age at which a child ceases to be a ‘child’ for the purposes of this priority need category; so there is no statutory maximum age. The critical question is not the child’s age, but the date at which the child (of whatever age) ceases to be ‘dependent’.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 Contrast with HA 1996, s 178(3). See English Code, para 8.7.
3 See 12.51–12.53.

12.46 One judge has expressed the view that the word ‘child’ should be construed in a narrower rather than a broader sense. He suggested that:

‘ . . . “children” cannot be taken to refer to children of any age but to those who have not, or perhaps have only just, attained their majority’.

12.47 The English Code refers to the phrase ‘dependent children’ as embracing ‘all children under 16’, and also:

‘. . . all children aged 16–18 who are in, or are about to begin, full-time education or training or who for other reasons are unable to support themselves and who live at home.’

This wording suggests that adults aged 18 can be ‘children’ for the purposes of HA 1996, Pt 7.\(^1\)

\(^1\) English Code, para 8.7.

12.48 In Miah v Newham London Borough Council, the Court of Appeal was dealing with a ‘child’ of 18. It refused the local housing authority permission to appeal against a decision that she was a dependent child. The court accepted that, applying the guidance in the English Code, the words could include children of any age up to the child’s nineteenth birthday and would therefore include someone in his or her eighteenth year.

12.49 The fact that the English Code, which is not determinative of the meaning of HA 1996, Pt 7, offers no guidance concerning those who have reached their nineteenth birthday does not necessarily mean that a person of 19 or older could not be a dependent child. However, in James v Waltham Forest London Borough Council a judge of the county court disagreed, taking the view that the English Code provides an exhaustive statement of those who may be regarded a dependent children, and that the applicant’s 19-year-old son could not confer a priority need on her.

\(^1\) As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

\(^2\) (2017) October Legal Action, p 33, CA.

12.50 In any event, it would be an extreme use of language to suggest that a person who had married could simultaneously be a ‘dependent child’ of his or her spouse for the purposes of this priority need provision. The Court of Appeal has decided that a 17-year-old wife was not a ‘dependent child’ and, as a result, her husband did not fall within this priority need category.\(^1\) The better course, now, would be for the 16- or 17-year-old wife to be the applicant, as she would have a priority need under the Priority Need Order and the husband would be accommodated with her in performance of any duty to accommodate her.

DEPENDENT

12.51 The term ‘dependent’ is also not defined in HA 1996, Pt 7. While it obviously includes financial dependence, local housing authorities are reminded by the English Code and the case-law that children may be financially independent, but not yet mature enough to live independently from their parents. They will therefore still be ‘dependent’ for these purposes.
12.51 Priority Need

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. Note that the phrase ‘dependant of an asylum seeker’ has a specific meaning set out at HA 1996, s 186(4), which is applicable to that section only. For a discussion of the meaning of ‘dependent’ in the planning context see [19]-[34] of Shortt v Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government [2014] EWHC 2480 (Admin), [2015] JPL 75, Admin Ct, where Hickinbottom J rejected a contention that the concept was limited to financial dependence.

12.52 HA 1996, Pt 7 does not say that the dependent child must be dependent on the applicant. On the face of it, the statutory language could be satisfied if a dependent child is living with the applicant, even if the child is wholly dependent on another. An example would be two brothers who live together, the eldest being in full-time employment, and the younger being financially supported by his parents who are abroad but send money. In such a case, the older brother would have a priority need, even though his brother was not financially dependent on him or her. The point is probably academic since, in this and any other similar examples, the younger brother would be likely to have some emotional dependence on his older brother.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

12.53 The English Code advises that ‘there must be actual dependence on the applicant’ although the dependence need not be wholly or exclusively on the applicant, suggesting that a child may be dependent upon more than one person. This wording, which was not in the older editions of the English Code prior to 2006, reflects the statutory language originally used in the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, when the category was defined as ‘if he has dependent children who are residing with him or who might reasonably be expected to reside with him’. Indeed, in 1996, a judge decided that this language did require that there be at least some dependency by the child on the applicant. However, that decision does not, strictly speaking, apply to the definition in HA 1996, Pt 7, and there is nothing in the case law on HA 1996, Pt 7 to suggest that this priority need category can only be met if the child is dependent on the applicant, rather than upon someone else.

1 English Code, para 8.6.

2 Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, s 2(1)(a).

3 R v Westminster City Council ex p Bishop (1997) 29 HLR 546, QBD at 551–4. The decision is complicated, because the language considered by the judge was not that in the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 but instead that in the Housing Act 1985, where the relevant category was said to be ‘with whom dependent children reside’ — removing ‘he has’. However, the Housing Act 1985 was a consolidating Act and so the judge held that the language used was not intended to change the original statutory meaning. HA 1996, which reproduces the language of the Housing Act 1985 (and not the language of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977) is not a consolidating Act, but replaces the legislative scheme in the Housing Act 1985. The language of HA 1996, Pt 7 (as amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) is not, therefore, subject to the same construction and can be considered afresh.

4 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

‘Resides with’ the applicant

12.54 The next question for the local housing authority is whether the dependent child actually resides with the applicant. This is a straightforward question of fact. If a child does in fact reside with the applicant, the question of whether or not the child ‘might reasonably be expected’ to reside with him or her does not arise.

12.55 The word ‘reside’ would not normally be used to describe a situation in which one person is visiting another, or even staying with them for a short time, such as for a holiday although the English Code, perhaps, goes too far in suggesting that there must be:

‘... some degree of permanence or regularity, rather than a temporary arrangement whereby the children are merely staying with the applicant for a limited period’.

1 English Code, para 8.6. There is no case law directly on point though R v Lewisham London Borough Council ex p Creppy [1992] 24 HLR 121, CA touches on the issue obliquely. However, the requirement for ‘permanence or regularity’ stipulated in the Code corresponds more naturally with the phrase ‘normally resides with ...’ (as used in HA 1996, s 176(a) for example) rather than ‘resides with ...’. Both formulations are contained in HA 1996, Pt 7 (as amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) implying that they are distinct concepts. This is reinforced by the difference in wording employed in the current and previous editions of the English Code. The Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities (Department for Communities and Local Government, Department for Education and Skills, Department of Health, July 2006), at para 10.6, spoke of applicants having a priority need ‘if they have one or more dependent children who normally live with them’. The word ‘normally’ has been omitted from para 8.6 of the 2018 edition of the English Code.

12.56 The English Code reminds local housing authorities that residence does not have to be full-time and that a child can be considered to reside with either or both parents, providing there is ‘some regularity’ to the arrangement.

1 English Code, para 8.10.

12.57 Children who are temporarily away from the applicant on holiday or for other purposes would ordinarily be said to ‘reside with’ the applicant during their absence, not with the person with whom they are staying.

12.58 Priority Need

'Reasonably expected to reside' with the applicant

12.58 Even if no dependent child is actually residing with him or her, an applicant will have priority need if at least one dependent child might reasonably be expected to reside with him or her. This covers the situation where the applicant and the dependent child (or children) are not currently living together but might reasonably be expected to live together in future. It will come into play where, for example, children are in the care of children’s services or staying with relatives, but would return to live with their parents if the parents obtain accommodation. In assessing whether a child might reasonably be expected to reside with the applicant, the best interests of the child will be of relevance and the duty under Children Act 2004, s 11 will be engaged. In this vein, the English Code advises that local housing authorities should take into account ‘the specific needs of the child, including whether suitable accommodation is available to them with their other parent’

1 HA 1996, s 189(1)(b).
2 See 9.86–9.87.
3 English Code, para 8.11.

12.59 Where children are in the care of a children’s services authority (whether voluntarily or under the terms of a care order) and are not currently living with the applicant, local housing authorities are advised that liaison with the children’s services authority is essential and that there should be joint consideration before the local housing authority reaches its decision.

1 Or children’s services department, in the case of a unitary authority.
2 English Code, para 8.12.

12.60 The correct approach to the question of whether it is reasonable to expect a person who does not currently live with an applicant to live with him or her is more fully discussed in Chapter 10.

1 See 10.29–10.32.

Separated parents and dependent children

12.61 Most of the difficult decisions on the ‘dependent children’ priority need category arise where the application is made by one of two parents who are separated. The local housing authority will have to consider three questions:

1. Is there a child who is dependent (‘dependency’)?
2. If so, does the child reside with the applicant (‘residence’)?
3. If not, is the child reasonably expected to reside with the applicant in the future (‘future residence’)?

Dependency

12.62 As already indicated, HA 1996, Pt 7 itself does not require that the child be dependent on the applicant. However, in cases where parents are separated, the expectation will be that the child is at least to some extent dependent on the parent who is applying to the local housing authority for homelessness assistance. Where a local housing authority found on the facts of a particular case that a child was exclusively dependent upon his mother (who received both child benefit and income support for the child) and not the father (who was the applicant), the father’s challenge to that decision was dismissed\(^3\). However, the question for the local housing authority is not whether the child is wholly and exclusively dependent upon the applicant, or upon its other parent\(^4\), but simply whether the child is dependent. The question of dependency has been described as ‘fact-sensitive to a very large degree’\(^5\).

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 See 12.51–12.53.

Residence and co-residence

12.63 When considering whether a child resides with the applicant, the local housing authority should consider all the circumstances, including whether or not a court order has been made in respect of where the child should reside. An issue about where a child resides, or might reasonably be expected to reside, might arise where a child’s two parents are separated, or in any other circumstance where more than one adult is involved in bringing up the child, such as different sets of foster parents, adoptive parents, grandparents or other members of the child’s family.

Residence orders

12.64 Where a residence order in favour of one of the parents has been made, the English Code advises that the local housing authority should normally follow the provisions of the order and treat the child as residing with the person identified in the order\(^6\).

1 English Code, para 8.9.

12.65 Nowadays, it is not unusual for family courts to make shared residence orders, either after a contested hearing between the parents, or by consent\(^7\). Shared residence orders can be made even when the child does not divide his or her time equally between the parents\(^8\). This is recognised in the current version of the English Code, which no longer advises that it is exceptional for a child to reside with both parents\(^9\).

1 Children Act 1989, s 8. As recognised by the House of Lords in Holmes-Moorhouse v Richmond upon Thames Royal London Borough Council [2009] UKHL 7, [2009] 1 WLR 413, HL per Lord Hoffmann at [7].

3 English Code, para 8.10. The 2002 English Code contained similar advice at para 8.10 (Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities (England) (Department of Health and Office of the Deputy Prime Minister), July 2002) but concluded ‘it would only be in very exceptional cases though that a child might be considered to reside with both parents’. This last sentence was omitted from the 2006 and 2018 versions of the English Code. In Holmes-Moorhouse v Richmond upon Thames Royal London Borough Council [2009] UKHL 7, [2009] 1 WLR 413, HL at [11], Lord Hoffmann described the paragraph in the 2002 Code as ‘muddling in its reasoning’ and saying little as to what considerations the local housing authority should take into account.

Informal arrangements

12.66 Where no court order has been obtained, the local housing authority cannot just refuse to consider the question of a child’s residence until a court makes such an order. The local housing authority must consider all the present circumstances of the case. It is looking to see whether the child resides with the applicant; it is not enough that the child visits the applicant. A court order or parental agreement for staying contact does not make the visiting child resident or co-resident with the applicant, because ‘staying access does not equal residence’ and ‘the staying access will not amount to residence with their father’.

1 R v Ealing London Borough Council ex p Sidhu (1982) 2 HLR 45, QBD.
3 R v Port Talbot Borough Council ex p McCarthy (1991) 23 HLR 207, CA per Dillon LJ at 211.

12.67 A child need not live full-time with the applicant in order to ‘reside’ with him or her. The child may divide his or her time between the two parents. However, there should be ‘some regularity’ to the arrangement. The possibility that the child may be residing with both of his or her separated parents was previously described by the courts as ‘unlikely to be the normal arrangement’, as ‘a remote possibility’, or ‘a very rare case’. However, the current edition of the English Code reflects a more modern and flexible approach: ‘where parents separate, there will generally be a presumption towards shared residence though this will not always be on the basis of an equal amount of time being spent with both parents’.

1 English Code, para 8.10.
3 R v Lambeth London Borough Council ex p Vaglievlo (1990) 22 HLR 392, CA per Purchas LJ at 397.
4 English Code, para 8.10.

12.68 Local housing authorities which have considered where a child’s ‘main’ residence is, or which parent has a ‘greater’ responsibility, have been held to be wrong in law. But where a local housing authority applied the correct test (‘Does the child reside with the applicant?’), its decision that an applicant’s children did not reside with him (even though they spent three or four nights each week with him) was not wrong in law.

2 R v Oxford City Council ex p Doyle (1998) 30 HLR 506, QBD.

12.69 In Oxford City Council v Bull, three children moved from living with their mother in adequate accommodation to live with their father in a single room. He made an application for homelessness assistance shortly afterwards. The local housing authority accommodated the father and the three children in interim accommodation. It subsequently decided that the children were not residing with their father and that the arrangements in the interim accommodation should not be taken into account. The Court of Appeal held that the local housing authority’s decision was wrong in law. The period in interim accommodation constituted ‘residence’ for the purposes of HA 1996, s 189(1)(b). Accordingly, by the date of the review decision, the children were and had been ‘residing with’ their father. The interim accommodation was ‘where [the children] kept their clothes and possessions. It was their main home, from which they went to school. It is quite true that the children went to stay with their mother regularly, but that does not detract from the fact that they resided at their father’s house’.

2 HA 1996, s 188(1) as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 16.37–16.73.
4 Jackson LJ at [39]. However, the father had become homeless intentionally because his decision to permit the children to move in with him was his own deliberate conduct which led to his being required to leave his previous accommodation. See 13.159.

12.70 It is often very difficult to say whether a child is residing with an applicant (as distinct from visiting), and a sensitive home visit by an officer can provide the local housing authority with much useful information. But even when the facts are established, two officers of the same local housing authority (and, indeed, of different local housing authorities) can legitimately reach different conclusions. For example, in one case a visiting officer found the child with the applicant at his flat and the presence of ‘many personal effects, toothbrush and paste, clothing and food’ belonging to the child. The visiting officer concluded that this (together with assertions by both the separated parents that the child was residing with the applicant) established that the child was therefore living with the applicant. Her recommendation was reversed by her superior, who took a different view of the facts. The case amply demonstrates why, in this context, an initial adverse decision could usefully be subject to the review procedure in almost all cases. If the initial adverse decision is upheld on review, it may be sensible to apply to a different local housing authority with the prospect of receiving a more favourable decision.

1 R v Westminster City Council ex p Bishop (1997) 29 HLR 546, QBD.
2 Described at 19.8–19.213.

Future residence

12.71 If the child is not currently residing with the applicant, the local housing authority should next consider whether it is reasonable to expect the child to reside with him or her in the future. This issue will often arise in the context of a child whose parents have separated, but may be relevant if the child is living with foster parents, or there are potential adoptive parents, or other members of the child’s family wishes to be involved in the child’s up-bringing.

12.72 It may be that there is a genuine arrangement between the separated parents that the child should reside with the applicant once the applicant has suitable accommodation. Again, this is a question of fact for the local housing authority. Its decision letter should show that it has separately considered the questions:
12.72 Priority Need

(1) Is the child now residing with the applicant?
(2) If not, is it reasonable to expect the child to reside with the applicant in the future?1

1 For an illustration of a legal challenge prompted by the failure to distinguish these two questions, see R v Port Talbot Borough Council ex p McCarthy (1997) 23 HLR 207, CA.

12.73 In some cases, family courts have made shared residence orders, either after a contested hearing between the parents, or by consent. What should happen when the parents have a shared residence order but one parent is homeless and has made an application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority? His or her children do not actually reside with him or her.

12.74 This scenario was considered by the House of Lords in Holmes-Moorhouse v Richmond upon Thames Royal London Borough Council2. In that case, the Court of Appeal had held that once a family court had decided in contested proceedings that residence should be shared, and had made an order to that effect, the local housing authority could not deny that the children might reasonably be expected to live with the father (who was applying for homelessness assistance) as well as with their mother. The House of Lords overturned the Court of Appeal’s decision. It held that when the local housing authority is deciding whether dependent children might reasonably be expected to reside with a homeless parent, the local housing authority is entitled to take into account the fact that housing is a scarce resource, and to have regard to the social purposes of HA 1996, Pt 7, to the claims of other homeless applicants and the scale of the local housing authority’s own responsibilities. The question for the local housing authority is whether it is reasonably to be expected, in the context of a scheme for housing the homeless, that children who already have a home with one parent should also be able to reside with their other parent. The existence of a shared residence order is relevant, but not a determinative factor. It added that the paramount consideration for family courts, when deciding issues about the upbringing of a child, is the child’s welfare under Children Act 1989. A local housing authority should not intervene in family proceedings to argue against a court making a shared residence order, but the family court should not make a shared residence order unless it appears reasonably likely that both parties will have accommodation in which the children can reside.

1 [2009] UKHL 7, [2009] 1 WLR 413, HL.

12.75 In El Goure v Kensington & Chelsea Royal London Borough Council1, the Court of Appeal held that Lord Hoffmann’s reference in Holmes-Moorhouse v Richmond upon Thames Royal London Borough Council2 to it only being reasonable for a child to reside with both his or her separated parents ‘in exceptional circumstances’ was not intended to provide an additional test and the correct test was ‘the statutory test of reasonable expectation of residence’.

2 [2009] UKHL 7, [2009] 1 WLR 413, HL.
Vulnerability

12.76 To meet this category of priority need the relevant person (the applicant or a person with whom the applicant resides or might reasonably be expected to reside) must¹:

1. be currently ‘vulnerable’; and
2. be vulnerable by reason of one of the prescribed statutory matters.

‘Vulnerable’

12.77 The term ‘vulnerable’ is not defined in HA 1996, Pt 7. Its meaning was explained by the Court of Appeal in *R v Camden London Borough Council ex p Pereira*². That definition was repeatedly followed and applied in later cases, such as *Osmani v Camden London Borough Council*³ and was reproduced in the previous version of the English Code⁴. A person was taken to be ‘vulnerable’ if he or she was less able to fend for himself or herself than an ordinary homeless person and so would suffer injury or detriment in circumstances in which the ordinary homeless person would not. This gloss on the plain words of the HA 1996, s 189(1)(c) brought homelessness law to the point ‘where decision-makers were saying, of people who clearly had serious mental or physical disabilities, that “you are not vulnerable, because you are no more vulnerable than the usual run of street homeless people in our locality”’⁵.

¹ As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
³ [2004] EWCA Civ 1706; [2005] HLR 22, CA per Auld LJ at [38].

12.78 This was turned on its head in May 2015 following the decision of the Supreme Court in the conjoined appeals of *Hotak v Southwark London Borough Council, Kanu v Southwark London Borough Council & Johnson v Solihull Metropolitan Borough Council*⁶. Interestingly, the Supreme Court did go so far as to say that the decision in R v Camden London Borough Council ex p Pereira was wrong. The observations on the meaning of vulnerability made in that case were, according to Lord Neuberger ‘simply intended to be guidance to Camden housing authority as to how to approach Mr Pereira’s application’ and the real error lay in the fact that the guidance had not been ‘properly understood’ and had wrongly been ‘treated in some decisions of courts and reviewing officers almost as a statutory definition⁷’. Nevertheless, as will be seen from the discussion that follows at 12.82–12.91, the approach advocated by the Supreme Court differs significantly from that which had been taken in the cases following R v Camden London Borough Council ex p Pereira. As a consequence, all of the previous case law on vulnerability needs to be read carefully in light of the changes wrought by the Supreme Court’s judgment and should be applied with caution.

1 [2015] UKSC 30, [2016] AC 811, SC. In Hemley and Croydon London Borough Council (unreported) 25 July 2017, CA, the Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal by the local housing authority which sought to argue that a review decision applying the Pereira test would have been the same even if the guidance in Hotak v Southwark London Borough Council, Kanu v Southwark London Borough Council & Johnson v Solihull Metropolitan Borough Council had been applied. Lewison LJ observed at [14] that ‘a person may yet be vulnerable even though she can fend for herself’ and that ‘the review might have led to a different outcome if the correct test had been applied.’

12.78 Priority Need

The First Appellant in the Supreme Court was Sifatullah Hotak: a 23-year-old Afghan refugee suffering from learning disabilities, depression and post-traumatic stress disorder. He was heavily reliant on personal support from his 24-year-old brother Ezatullah. Sifatullah made an application for homelessness assistance to Southwark London Borough Council, with Ezatullah as a member of his household. Southwark decided that Sifatullah’s medical conditions were sufficiently serious for him to be vulnerable within the meaning of HA 1996, s 189(1)(c) if he were a single applicant but that as long as he was with his brother he would not be vulnerable since Ezatullah ‘would not allow circumstances to arise whereby his brother is placed at risk’.

The decision was upheld on appeal to the County Court and to the Court of Appeal.

12.80 The Second Appellant, Mr Johnson, described himself as a persistent criminal offender, and a recovering heroin addict who was prescribed methadone for his addiction. His addiction underpinned his offending. He made an application for homelessness assistance to Solihull Metropolitan Borough Council but was found not to be vulnerable. This was upheld on review. The review decision noted that ‘[t]here is, therefore, a chance that if you were street homeless or even accommodated that you would return to using drugs. Even if you do slip back to using drugs this would not necessarily be anything unusual in relation to homeless people. For example, Homeless Link’s Survey of Needs and Provision (SNAP) 2010 found that drug issues were among the issues most frequently affecting the users of homelessness services. SNAP 2010 found that 92% of homelessness services are working with people who are experiencing problems with drugs . . . Given the above I am not satisfied that your drug history makes you vulnerable1. The decision was upheld on appeal to the County Court and to the Court of Appeal2.

12.81 The Third Appellant, Mr Kanu suffered from a number of health conditions, including hepatitis B, back pain affecting his mobility, high blood pressure, haemorrhoids and a mental disorder which involved suicidal ideations. He made an application for homelessness assistance to Southwark London Borough Council having been evicted from his previous accommodation, which he had occupied with this wife and adult son, because it was required by the landlord for redevelopment. On review it was decided that although Mr Kanu might have been vulnerable as an individual applicant, the availability of support from his wife and son meant that he did not have a priority need. With regard to the public sector equality duty under Equality Act 2010, s 149 the decision accepted that Mr Kanu might be disabled and indicated that inquiries had been made into his medical conditions as a consequence, but that Equality Act 2010, s 149 did not override the underlying decision that he was not vulnerable. The decision was quashed on appeal to the county court. The Court of Appeal allowed Southwark’s appeal against the decision of the county court2. In all three cases the guidance on vulnerability given by the Court of Appeal in R v Camden London Borough Council ex p Pereira in 19993 was applied.

1 See 9.81–9.83 and 12.100.

12.82 In the Supreme Court, three issues arose for consideration: (i) whether the test for vulnerability for the purposes of HA 1996, s 189(1)(c) involved a comparator and, if so, who that comparator should be; (ii) in assessing vulnerability whether it was permissible to take into account the support which would be provided by a family member or member of the applicant’s household; and (iii) what effect, if any, the public sector equality duty under Equality Act 2010, s 149 has on the determination of vulnerability.

12.83 On the first issue, the Supreme Court, departing from the formulation applied in R v Camden London Borough Council ex p Pereira1, held that the test of vulnerability under HA 1996, s 189(1)(c) involved a comparison with an ordinary person if made homeless, as opposed to an ordinary homeless person. The comparison is with ordinary people generally, not ordinary people locally. Where an applicant is ‘significantly more vulnerable’ than an ordinary person if made homeless, or ‘more at risk of harm without accommodation than an ordinary person would be’, then he or she will be classed as vulnerable2. When applying the test, a local housing authority should not rely on statistics as to the characteristics of the ordinary person3. The resources of the local housing authority have no relevance to the assessment of vulnerability4. This test has now been incorporated into the English Code5.

12.83 Priority Need

4 English Code, para 8.15.

12.84 The meaning of the word ‘significantly’ in this context caused some initial difficulty following the decision in Hotak v Southwark London Borough Council, Kanu v Southwark London Borough Council & Johnson v Solihull Metropolitan Borough Council⁵. It is a word with several possible meanings which may vary according to the context in which it is used. Perhaps unsurprisingly a number of appeals were brought in the county court, following the Supreme Court’s decision, challenging the way in which local housing authorities had evaluated the significance of a particular vulnerability or the adequacy of reasons given to explain what the word significantly was thought to mean. The approach adopted by the county court in considering these appeals was not entirely consistent.

As used by Lord Neuberger at [53].

12.85 It is to be hoped that the difficulties posed by this issue have now been resolved by the Court of Appeal in the conjoined appeals in Panayiotou v Waltham Forest London Borough Council, Smith v Haringey London Borough Council⁵. In that case Lewison LJ explained that the use of the word significant denoted a qualitative rather than a quantitative test:

‘I do not, therefore consider that Lord Neuberger can have used “significantly” in such a way as to introduce for the first time a quantitative threshold, particularly in the light of his warning about glossing the statute. Rather, in my opinion, he was using the adverb in a qualitative sense. In other words, the question to be asked is whether, when compared to an ordinary person if made homeless, the applicant, in consequence of a characteristic within section 189(1)(c), would suffer or be at risk of suffering harm or detriment which the ordinary person would not suffer or be at risk of suffering such that the harm or detriment would make a noticeable difference to his ability to deal with the consequences of homelessness. To put it another way, what Lord Neuberger must have meant was that an applicant would be vulnerable if he were at risk of more harm in a significant way. Whether the test is met in relation to any given set of facts is a question of evaluative judgment for the reviewer.’

The danger with this kind of guidance (as the court observed) is that it may simply replace ‘one imprecise formulation of the test with another’ posing a risk of ‘further semantic debate about the boundaries of meaning of the 12.86 With that note of caution, the guidance would appear to suggest that the significance of an applicant’s vulnerability is primarily a question of its relevance. Specifically, its relevance to the applicant’s ability to deal with the consequences of homelessness. A vulnerability will be relevant in this context, if it manifests itself in the form of ‘an impairment of a person’s ability to find accommodation or, if he cannot find it, to deal with the lack of it’. The latter might take the form of ‘an expectation that a person’s physical or mental health would deteriorate; or it may be exposure to some external risk such as the risk of exploitation by others’¹. The assessment of these issues involves an evaluative judgment on the part of the local housing authority. To give a practical example, a fear of heights might not be regarded as ‘significant’ in this context. The reason being that it is unlikely to be relevant to an applicant’s ability to find accommodation. Similarly, homelessness is unlikely to involve any exposure to heights. The fear of heights, however severe, has little relevance in this context.²

12.87 This is not to say that any relevant vulnerability will be sufficient to meet the statutory criteria. The harm or detriment which the applicant would suffer (or be at risk of suffering) must have a noticeable impact on his or her ability to deal with the consequences of homelessness and, to satisfy the comparative element of the test, must not be something which the ordinary person would experience.³

12.88 However, a proper application of the statutory test should not focus solely on the degree of magnitude of the harm that the applicant might suffer. That is, applying the test correctly is not as simple as asking whether the effect of a condition or characteristic is ‘more than minor or trivial’, or at the other end of the spectrum, whether it would result in ‘more harm plus’, since that would be a quantitative assessment of the type deprecated by the court.

12.89 Drawing these threads together it might be said that an applicant who, if without accommodation, will suffer (or be at risk of suffering) from harm that:

• will impact on his or her ability to find accommodation or deal with the lack of it;
12.89 Priority Need

- will be noticeable in extent; and
- would not be experienced by the ordinary person;

might properly be regarded as being at ‘risk of more harm in a significant way’ and therefore vulnerable. Provided that this harm (or risk of harm) is the result of one of the statutory causes\(^1\) then he or she will have a priority need as a result of HA 1996, s 189(1)(c). A local housing authority which has properly applied this approach will not generally be faulted simply because ‘it failed to define ‘vulnerable’ or ‘significantly’ or failed to list the attributes of the ordinary person if made homeless\(^2\).

12.90 On the second of the three issues addressed by the Supreme Court in Hotak v Southwark London Borough Council, Kanu v Southwark London Borough Council & Johnson v Solihull Metropolitan Borough Council\(^1\), it was decided that support provided by a family or household member can be taken into account in assessing vulnerability. But the local housing authority must be satisfied that such support will be available on a consistent and predictable basis and will be sufficient to prevent the applicant from being vulnerable\(^2\). The answer to this question must be based on evidence not presumptions\(^3\).

12.91 On the third point, it was decided that the public sector equality duty is complementary to the duty under HA 1996, s 189(1)(c). When assessing whether an applicant with an actual or possible disability is vulnerable, each stage of the decision-making process should be carried out with the duty well in mind and the duty ‘must be exercised in substance, with rigour, and with an open mind’\(^1\).

---

Making inquiries into whether a person is vulnerable

12.92 Whether a person is ‘vulnerable’ is a question of fact and degree for the local housing authority to determine. It is not a question that can be delegated to a doctor, nurse, consultant or anyone else\(^1\).

---

12.93 A local housing authority will usually need to make inquiries\(^1\) into the applicant’s medical condition in order to determine vulnerability. The local housing authority should take account of any medical evidence it receives and may seek its own medical adviser’s view. Indeed, ‘. . . where the applicant claims to be vulnerable for medical reasons or where on making proper inquiries it is apparent to the authorities that such is his claim, it is both proper and necessary . . . to take and consider a medical opinion, unless the applicant’s condition renders him so obviously vulnerable that that is not necessary’.

1 See also 9.70–9.80.
2 English Code, para 8.25.
3 R v Lambeth London Borough Council ex p Carroll (1988) 20 HLR 142, QBD per Webster J at 150. In particular, in cases where the applicant claims to be vulnerable as a result of mental health issues, medical evidence is likely to be essential. See R (IA) v Westminster City Council [2013] EWHC 1273 (Admin), (2013) July Legal Action, p 23, Admin Ct. See further English Code, para 8.25.

12.94 Very often the medical evidence will be helpful in identifying the physical disability, mental handicap or mental illness, but less useful on whether the applicant satisfies the definition of ‘vulnerable’. That is a question for a local housing authority, not a doctor. If a view is expressed by a medical expert, that view is merely one consideration which may influence the local housing authority’s own conclusion, but it is certainly not bound by it. Likewise, the local housing authority’s own medical adviser may express a view on ‘vulnerability’, but the local housing authority should not merely rubber-stamp that view. Where there is competing medical evidence, the evaluation of it is a matter for the local housing authority. Sufficient reasons must be given where a decision is taken to depart from the medical evidence, or to prefer one piece over another. A local housing authority relying on its own medical adviser is not bound to refer each and every medical document to the adviser but must do so where there is a ‘demonstrable need’, for example where a new report is obtained which is materially different to the documents which have already been referred to the adviser.

12.95 In keeping with the general burden that applies to the making of inquiries, it is for the local housing authority to make all necessary inquiries into the person’s medical condition, not for the applicant to produce medical evidence. The applicant may, however, be expected to give written consent to the local housing authority’s medical advisers to seek medical information or inspect medical records. The local housing authority is under a duty to act fairly in its gathering of, and use of, medical information. That includes a requirement to put adverse medical opinions to the applicant for comment before an initial decision is reached.\(^2\)

---

1. See 9.31–9.35.

12.96 There has been some judicial consideration of the role of medical advisers to local housing authorities. A local housing authority is entitled to obtain its own expert opinion, but care has to be taken not to appear to be using professional medical advisers simply to provide or shore up reasons for a negative decision.\(^1\) Where there is a conflict between medical opinions, the local housing authority must bear in mind the respective qualifications of the experts.\(^2\) The local housing authority’s medical adviser has the function of enabling the local housing authority to understand the medical issues and to evaluate for itself the expert evidence from the applicant’s medical advisers. In the absence of an examination of the patient, the local housing authority’s medical adviser’s advice cannot itself constitute expert evidence of an applicant’s condition. The local housing authority must take any absence of a personal examination of the applicant into account.\(^3\) If a medical adviser has not personally examined the applicant, he or she could consider discussing the applicant’s condition with his or her treating doctors.\(^4\)

2. R v Newham London Borough Council ex p Lamley (2001) 33 HLR 11, QBD; Khelassi v Brent London Borough Council [2006] EWCA Civ 1825, CA; and Shala v Birmingham City Council [2007] EWCA Civ 624, [2008] HLR 8, CA. All of those cases concerned medical evidence from a psychiatrist which had been evaluated by a GP advising the local housing authority.
3. The need to accord due weight to those medical professionals who have personal experience of the applicant is important and sometimes overlooked: research has disclosed a perception among some local housing authorities that applicants’ GPs were lacking in objectivity and more likely to be ‘on the side of the applicant’ (J Bretherton, C Hunter and S Johnsen “You can judge them on how they look . . . ” Homelessness Officers, Medical Evidence and Decision Making in England (2013) 7 European Journal of Homelessness 1, 69–92 at 83). See also Medical evidence in homelessness cases (2013) October Legal Action, pp 28–30.
4. Shala v Birmingham City Council [2007] EWCA Civ 624, [2008] HLR 8, CA per Sedley LJ at [23]. The Court of Appeal made these comments in relation to the use of medical advisers from the organisation, Nowmedical, which is regularly used by local housing authorities. However, the Court of Appeal refused permission to bring a second appeal where the applicant was arguing that advice from Nowmedical should not be relied upon by local housing authorities in any circumstances (Harper v Oxford City Council [2007] EWCA Civ 1169, (2008) January Legal Action, p 37, CA). See Thomas v Lambeth London Borough Council (2017) November Legal Action, p 42, County Court at Central London for a case exposing the potential pitfalls in reliance on such advice.

12.97 Recent examples of cases where the content of medical advice obtained by a local housing authority has received judicial consideration include Thomas v Lambeth London Borough Council, where the judge expressed the view that ‘it is unhelpful for these reports to identify problems that the appellant is not alleged to be suffering from . . . and then reach a conclusion based on the absence of those factors’, and *R (J and L) v Hillingdon London Borough Council*¹, where the judge stressed the need for such advice to be confined to the medical issues in the case. That case involved a young autistic boy with challenging behaviour, who was prone to trips and falls. He lived with his mother by a busy road. A social worker had assessed him as being at risk of being run over on the road outside the house. Medical advice relied on by the local housing authority in the course of its decision making criticised the social worker for requesting rehousing on behalf of the family, suggesting this ‘may pose a risk of unhelpfully raising expectations’, and expressed the view that ‘maintaining any child’s safety on a road remains a normal parenting role’ and not something that would render the property unsuitable. Nicklin J described the medical advice as ‘very unimpressive’ in so far as it provided ‘superficial answers to issues that had no medical dimension and upon which he should not have been commenting at all’².

12.98 It is for the local housing authority to decide what inquiries are necessary and what weight to give to the various pieces of medical evidence though, where relevant medical evidence (or an opinion expressed therein) has been rejected, reasons should be given to explain why. A local housing authority’s decision is only susceptible to challenge for failure to make all necessary inquiries if no reasonable local housing authority would have failed to regard certain additional inquiries as necessary. Inquiries by local housing authorities in these ‘medical’ cases are further considered at 9.70–9.80.

12.99 Medical reports obtained as part of an assessment by the Department for Work and Pensions of a person’s entitlement to specific welfare benefits may be taken into account by the local housing authority, but the local housing authority must bear in mind that assessment of eligibility for benefits is a wholly different exercise from assessment of priority need.

12.100 There will obviously be a close relationship between the issue of vulnerability and a possible disability that the applicant, or a member of the applicant’s household, might have. This relationship will require the local housing authority to be alive to the requirements of the public sector equality duty under Equality Act 2010, s 149. The local housing authority must always take due steps to consider any disability (or other protected characteristic) that might be relevant. The public sector equality duty is not confined to circumstances where the disability is ‘obvious’. The decision-maker must make inquiries into the issue of disability if some feature of the evidence presented raises a ‘real possibility’ that the applicant (or a member of his or her household) might be disabled and that disability (or other protected characteristic) is relevant to the decision under consideration. This is a question of fact for the local housing authority. The duty must be kept in mind at every stage of the decision-making process and ‘must be exercised in substance, with rigour, and with an open mind’. This will require the decision maker to ‘focus very sharply’ on: (i) whether the applicant is under a disability (or has another protected characteristic); (ii) the extent of such disability; (iii) the likely effect of the disability, when taken together with any other features, on the applicant when homeless; and (iv) whether the applicant is, as a result, vulnerable. A court in assessing whether this duty has been complied with should not resort to ‘over-zealous linguistic analysis’. However, in order to properly discharge the duty sufficient reasons must be given so that on a ‘stand-back’ reading of the decision, it can be seen that the relevant questions have been addressed.

1 For vulnerable as a result of a mental or physical impairment, see 12.106–12.115.
2 For an overview of the requirements of the public sector equality duty generally and in the context of HA 1996, Pt 7 (as amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) see Hackney London Borough Council v Haque [2017] EWCA Civ 5, [2017] HLR 14, CA per Briggs LJ at [18]–[24] and [32]–[36]. See further 18.65–18.68 on the requirements of the public sector equality duty in the context of decisions on the suitability of accommodation. Examples of recent cases where the county court has found that the public sector equality duty has not been properly discharged in assessing vulnerability include Hosseini v Westminster City Council (2015) October Legal Action, p 42, County Court at Central London; Barrett v Westminster City Council (2016) February Legal Action, p 45, County Court at Central London; SS v Waltham Forest London Borough Council (2016) November Legal Action, p 41, County Court at Central London; MQ v Southwark London Borough Council (2016) December Legal Action, p 42, County Court at Central London.
3 See Equality Act 2010, ss 5–12 and s 149. Although the case law on the public sector equality duty has, in the main, been focused on those who may be vulnerable as a result of a disability, it is important to recall that disability is not the only protected characteristic. In SS v Waltham Forest London Borough Council (2016) November Legal Action, p 41, County Court at Central London and in MQ v Southwark London Borough Council (2016) December Legal Action, p 42, County Court at Central London the court found there had been a breach of the public sector equality duty with regard to the applicant’s sex.
5 See Birmingham City Council v Wilson [2016] EWCA Civ 1137, [2017] HLR 4, CA per Sales LJ at [38]–[40].

12.101 Once the local housing authority is satisfied that there is ‘vulnerability’, the next step is for it to decide on the cause. For there to be priority need, the vulnerability must have arisen as a result of one of the specified statutory causes\(^1\) or one of the additional causes set out in the Priority Need Order\(^2\). If the relevant person is vulnerable, but the cause of the vulnerability cannot be put into one of the specified categories, the relevant person may still be vulnerable for some ‘other special reason’\(^4\).

\(^{1}\) In Hotak v Southwark London Borough Council, Kanu v Southwark London Borough Council & Johnson v Solihull Metropolitan Borough Council [2015] UKSC 30, [2016] AC 811, SC at [46], Lord Neuberger considered that whether or not this requires a one or two stage test to be applied will probably depend on the facts of the case in hand but that ‘the one stage test will probably be more practical in most cases’.

\(^{3}\) SI 2002/2051. See 12.102.

The statutory causes

12.102 A range of potential causes of vulnerability are set out in HA 1996, Pt 7, and in the Homelessness (Priority Need for Accommodation) (England) Order 2002\(^2\), including ‘old age’, ‘physical disability’\(^6\) and many others. But a person does not accrue priority need simply by achieving ‘old age’ or by reason of having a ‘physical disability’, etc. Neither being 100 years old nor having lost a limb (or even two) automatically qualifies a relevant person as having priority need. The specified statutory causes are relevant only in that they could give rise to a vulnerability that counts for priority need purposes. The test is not whether an applicant, or a member of his or her household, falls within the ambit of one of these causes, but whether he or she is vulnerable and, if so, whether the vulnerability is the result of one of the specified reasons (or the result of some ‘other special reason’). The full list is:

1. old age\(^3\);
2. mental illness\(^4\);
3. mental handicap\(^5\);
4. physical disability\(^6\);
5. other special reason\(^7\);
6. having been looked after, accommodated or fostered\(^8\);
7. having been in the armed forces\(^9\);
8. having been imprisoned\(^10\); or
9. having been driven from home by actual or threatened violence\(^11\).

12.103 The vulnerability need not be wholly the result of one of the specified matters listed above. Many vulnerable individuals will have been rendered vulnerable by several causes or by a combination of factors. Some causal factors may be in the list, others not. The statutory test is satisfied if at least one of the listed matters contributes to the vulnerability. So, in one case\(^1\), the court considered that a man who had been reduced to a state of vulnerability by alcoholism would not normally, by that reason alone, have qualified. But he had suffered a severe head injury a year prior to his application and the medical advice was that this had caused ‘some persistent disability made worse by his drinking habits’. The court said that whether the brain injury was described as a ‘mental handicap’ or ‘other special reason’, it was ‘another important factor’ in the applicant’s current vulnerability and made the ‘whole difference’ so as to bring him into the priority need category. In another case, a man who had an addiction to hard drugs, partly as a result of having spent most of his childhood in care, might be ‘vulnerable’ as a result of the combination of difficulties he suffered from\(^2\).
12.103 Priority Need

\(^1\) R v Waveney District Council ex p Bowers [1983] QB 238, CA.

Old age

12.104 ‘Old age’ is not defined in HA 1996, Pt 7\(^1\). The English Code advises that ‘it may be that as a result of old age the applicant would be significantly more vulnerable than an ordinary person would be if homeless’ but that local housing authorities ‘should not use a fixed age beyond which vulnerability occurs automatically (or below which it can be ruled out)’ and that each case should be considered on its individual circumstances\(^2\). Such guidance is of little practical value and local housing authorities are left to determine for themselves whether a person can be said to be ‘old’ for these purposes.

\(^1\) As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
\(^2\) English Code, para 8.24.

12.105 Earlier editions of the English Code had suggested particular ages but this only produced unhelpful rigidity. For example, an early Code suggested that men reaching 65, should be accepted. ‘Taken literally this would mean that a healthy man of 64 would not be vulnerable while the same man at 65 would be’\(^3\). Not surprisingly, therefore, there is no specific guidance offered by the current Code, nor by any reported cases, as to what constitutes ‘old age’.

\(^1\) R v Waveney District Council ex p Bowers [1983] QB 238, CA per Waller LJ at 245.

Mental illness or (mental) handicap

12.106 The statutory term ‘mental illness or handicap’ plainly includes a wide range of conditions\(^1\). Mental illness and mental handicap are, however, two very different things. The reference to ‘handicap’ is dated. In more modern language this could be described as ‘learning disability’ which is the phrase currently employed in the English Code\(^2\). In determining whether there is such illness or handicap contributing to current vulnerability, a local housing authority will need to have regard to any advice from medical professionals, social services or current providers of care and support\(^3\). Local housing authorities will need to have in place arrangements for liaising with social services and mental health services. Advice from these agencies should be sought where necessary. Consideration should also be given to joint assessments with these agencies or the use of a trained mental health practitioner as part of the assessment team\(^4\).

1. In considering this statutory cause of vulnerability, local authorities will need to be alive to the possibility that the public sector equality duty under Equality Act 2010, s 149 may be engaged. See 12.100.
2. English Code, paras 8.13(b) and 8.25–8.27.
4. English Code, paras 8.25–8.27.

12.107 Those discharged from hospitals following a period of treatment for mental illness are likely to be vulnerable\(^1\). Although health authorities are supposed to make appropriate pre-discharge arrangements\(^2\) and help with housing may be available from the NHS under the Care Programme Approach\(^3\), if the applicant is actually vulnerable, the fact that such arrangements should have been (or could have been) made is irrelevant\(^4\).

4. See 12.90 for the relevance of third-party support in assessing vulnerability.

12.108 Local housing authorities should clearly distinguish, in the decision letter dealing with this category of priority need, between any mental illness and any mental handicap\(^1\).

1. R v Bath City Council ex p Sangermano (1985) 17 HLR 94, QBD.

12.109 Where there is more than one mental condition, the local housing authority must consider the combined impact of the various conditions on the applicant, as well as any physical disability or other conditions that cumulatively might render the applicant vulnerable\(^1\).

12.110 A wide range of conditions have been explored in the case law as potentially or actually falling within the terms ‘mental illness’ and ‘handicap’. These include:

1. accidental brain injury\(^1\);
2. ‘subnormal’ intelligence (without any psychiatric disturbance or psychiatric history)\(^2\);
3. depression\(^3\);
4. epilepsy\(^4\);
5. persecutory delusion disorder and lack of insight\(^5\);
6. severe poly-drug dependence syndrome\(^6\); and
7. post-traumatic stress disorder\(^7\).

Physical disability

12.111 Physical disabilities\(^1\) that have an adverse impact on an applicant’s susceptibility to harm when homeless may be readily discernible, but the English Code recommends that medical or social services advice should be sought wherever necessary\(^2\).

\(^1\) In considering this statutory cause of vulnerability, local authorities will need to be alive to the possibility that the public sector equality duty under Equality Act 2010, s 149 may be engaged. See 12.100.

\(^2\) English Code, paras 8.25 and 8.27.

12.112 There is no requirement that any particular degree of disability is present, nor that it is of any particular duration. The phrase ‘substantial disability’ is not part of the statutory rubric\(^1\). The question is simply whether the relevant person is vulnerable wholly or partly by reason of his or her current physical disability\(^2\).

\(^1\) R v Lambeth London Borough Council ex p Carroll (1988) 20 HLR 142, QBD per Webster J at 145.

\(^2\) In Wandsworth London Borough Council v Brown [2005] EWCA Civ 907, the Court of Appeal refused permission to appeal against a first-instance judge’s order varying the local housing authority’s decision from one of no priority need to a decision that the applicant had a priority need. The applicant suffered from ‘extreme sciatica, back pain, asthma, severe psoriasis and dermatitis and narcolepsy’ and an ‘extreme combination of a variety of very different ailments’, which made the case unusual and one in which there could be only one conclusion – that he was vulnerable.

12.113 A local housing authority is not bound to treat someone as vulnerable as a result of a physical disability simply because the Department for Work and Pensions has awarded that person a benefit such as Disability Living Allowance or Personal Independence Payments\(^1\).

12.114 Where there is more than one physical disability, the local housing authority must consider the combined impact of the various conditions on the applicant, as well as any other conditions, such as mental illness or handicap, that cumulatively might render the applicant vulnerable\(^1\).

\(^1\) Crossley v Westminster City Council [2006] EWCA Civ 140, [2006] HLR 26, CA.

12.115 HA 1996, Pt 7\(^1\) does not specifically deal with vulnerability arising through physical illness. Plainly, a person suffering from, for example, influenza may be rendered ‘vulnerable’ in the relevant sense. But unless the local housing authority is prepared to accept the fact of physical illness as some ‘other special reason’\(^2\), vulnerability caused by it will not attract a finding of ‘priority need’. On the other hand there will be circumstances in which acute long-term illness itself amounts to disability\(^3\).

\(^1\) As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
\(^3\) For example, Equality Act 2010, Sch 1, para 6 which deems cancer, HIV infection and multiple sclerosis to be disabilities for the purposes of Equality Act 2010.

Other special reason

12.116 If a person is vulnerable, but not by reason of any of the factors specified in HA 1996, Pt 7, or the English Priority Need Order\(^1\), the question is whether he or she is vulnerable by reason of some ‘other special reason’ or reasons\(^2\). This term is not defined in HA 1996, Pt 7\(^3\), or in the English Code. It is a free-standing category, and is not limited to physical or mental factors.

\(^1\) SI 2002/2051. See 12.132–12.194.
\(^2\) HA 1996, s 189(1)(c).
\(^3\) As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

12.117 In R v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council ex p Kihara\(^1\), the Court of Appeal held that ‘special’ means that the difficulties faced must be of an unusual degree of gravity. Asylum-seekers who were homeless, had no right to receive welfare benefits, had no income or capital, no family or friends, no opportunity to work and, in some cases, spoke no English were plainly in priority need for some ‘other special reason’\(^2\).

\(^1\) (1997) 29 HLR 147, CA.
\(^2\) Since 3 April 2000, most asylum seekers who are destitute are not eligible for homelessness assistance and receive support and accommodation from the Home Office. See 11.101–11.121.

12.118 There are no set or pre-determined groups of people who would fall within this category. Local housing authorities should keep an open mind, and consider the whole of an applicant’s circumstances\(^1\).

\(^1\) English Code, paras 8.38–8.42.

12.119 Whilst reminding local housing authorities of the need to consider the relevant individual’s circumstances, the English Code does give a number of examples of people whose circumstances might amount to their being vulnerable for an ‘other special reason’. A number of cases have also come before the courts.
12.120 Priority Need

12.120 Young people who do not fall within any other category of priority may be vulnerable for some ‘other special reason’, and local housing authorities should consider the degree of support available to a young person, along with the cost and practicalities of finding and maintaining a home for the first time. Young people who were forced to leave the parental home, or who left it because of violence or sexual abuse, are particularly likely to be vulnerable.

In England, former care-leavers who are vulnerable as a result of having been looked after, accommodated or fostered have a priority need under the Priority Need Order.

1 English Code, para 8.40. See also the Scottish cases of Kelly v Monklands District Council 1985 SLT 165, OH; and Wilson v Nithsdale District Council 1992 SLT 1131, OH.

12.121 People who flee their homes as a result of harassment that falls short of actual violence or threats of violence may be vulnerable for an ‘other special reason’. Witnesses who may be at risk of intimidation could also fall within this category.

1 English Code, para 8.41.

12.122 The previous edition of the English Code suggested that former asylum-seekers may fall within this category if they are vulnerable. Their experience of persecution in their country of origin and/or severe hardship in reaching the UK would be relevant, and local housing authorities should be sensitive to the fact that former asylum-seekers may be reluctant to discuss some of their experiences.

2 Homelessness Code of Guidance for Local Authorities (Department for Communities and Local Government, Department for Education and Skills, Department of Health, July 2006), para 10.35. This paragraph has not been reproduced in the 2018 version of the English Code but the underlying logic remains good and the situation of former asylum seekers is one that has been recognised by the courts. See for example Al-Qunian v Brent London Borough Council [1999] June Legal Action, p 24, Willesden County Court; Shala v Birmingham City Council [2007] EWCA Civ 624, [2008] HLR 8, CA; Al-Kabi v Southwark London Borough Council (2008) March Legal Action, p 21, Lambeth County Court; and Sesay v Islington London Borough Council (2008) September Legal Action, p 25, Clerkenwell and Shoreditch County Court.

12.123 Drug or alcohol addiction and the risk of relapsing could fall within this ‘other special reason’ category if the relevant person is vulnerable as a result of it. In R v Waveney District Council ex p Bowers, the Court of Appeal held that self-induced alcoholism would not normally result in a finding of ‘vulnerability’. This was described as a ‘grey area’ in Crossley v City of Westminster. Giving the judgment of the court, Sedley LJ said: ‘drug addiction by itself, for all its personal and social consequences, cannot amount to a special reason for vulnerability which is capable of being addressed by housing’. However in Johnson v Solihull Metropolitan Borough Council the Supreme Court was prepared to assume, without deciding, that actual or potential problems with drugs fall within the expression ‘other special reason’\(^5\). The local housing authority should, in any event, consider whether there are other factors, including the possibility of harm suffered as a result of relapse into drug addiction if the applicant is on the streets, or the lack of family support available to the applicant, which would render the applicant ‘vulnerable’ for an ‘other special reason’. In Crossley v City of Westminster,\(^6\) the applicant’s combination of problems – he had spent his childhood from the age of three in care, he had developed his addiction to heroin at the age of 13, he had been sleeping rough from the age of 17, with short spells in hostels and in prison, he was chronically depressed and suffered from asthma and hepatitis C – were described as ‘stark facts’ pointing to a decision that he was vulnerable\(^7\).

7. Another case involving multiple problems, including drug misuse, was Payne v Kingston upon Thames Royal London Borough Council (2008) March Legal Action, p 21, Central London Civil Justice Centre, where a decision that a single woman, who had been a victim of abuse and domestic violence, and had a history of mental health problems and of drug misuse, was not vulnerable was quashed.

12.124 Victims of trafficking, within the meaning of Art 4 of the Council of Europe Convention on Action Against Trafficking in Human Beings\(^1\), may also fall within the ‘other special reason’ category, where the applicant’s vulnerability arises from his or her status as a trafficking victim. This potential cause of vulnerability is not one that has been considered by the courts in the context of Housing Act 1996, Pt 7\(^2\). However, the Supreme Court has recognised that there is an emerging and ‘prominent strain of current public policy against trafficking and in favour of the protection of its victims’\(^3\). In addition, the European Court of Human Rights has held that Art 4 of the European Convention on Human Rights places states under a positive obligation to provide practical and effective protection against trafficking and exploitation in general and specific measures of protection\(^4\). Local housing authorities must act compatibly with those rights contained in the European Convention on Human Rights as are set out in the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, and so will need to be alive to the particular vulnerabilities of trafficking victims and the risk that they may face of being re-trafficked if they are without accommodation, in order to ensure compliance with Art 4\(^6\).

1. CETS No 197.
2. As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. The topic has received some consideration in Scotland, in the case of O v Aberdeen City Council [2017] CSOH 9, 2017 SLT 181, where the Court of Session rejected an attempt to argue that Art 4 of the European Convention on Human Rights gave rise to a general obligation to accommodate homeless victims of trafficking under Housing (Scotland) Act 1987, Pt 2, who would not otherwise have been eligible for homeless assistance on the basis of their immigration status. See further XPQ v Hammersmith and Fulham London Borough Council [2018] EWHC 1391 (QB) which involved an (unsuccesful) claim for damages arising from an alleged failure to provide suitable accommodation. In that case, the High Court considered the interplay between HA 1996, Pt 7, the Council of Europe Convention on Action Against Trafficking in Human Beings and the EU Directive on Preventing and Combating Trafficking in Human Beings, 2011/36/EU.
12.124 Priority Need

For an insight into some of the difficulties in accessing accommodation faced by victims of trafficking see Life Beyond the Safe House For Survivors of Modern Slavery in London (Human Trafficking Foundation, July 2015).

12.125 This is reflected in the English Code which stipulates that local housing authorities should ensure that staff have an awareness of ‘the possibility that applicants may be victims of trafficking or of modern slavery, and are able to assess whether or not they are vulnerable as a result’ 1. Further guidance is contained in chapter 21 of the English Code which is dedicated to victims of modern slavery and trafficking. Local housing authorities are reminded that applicants who are victims of trafficking may be in considerable distress and that appropriate training would benefit those staff conducting interviews 2. Applicants should be given the option of being interviewed by someone of the same sex 3. And in assessing vulnerability, local housing authorities should take account of any advice from specialist agencies providing services to the applicant and be mindful that ‘if a victim of modern slavery is threatened with homelessness or is homeless this significantly increases their risk to being re-trafficked or exposed to further exploitation’ 4.

Homeless ‘as a result of an emergency’

12.126 Any applicant (the only relevant person under this category) will have a priority need if currently homeless (or threatened with homelessness) as a ‘result of an emergency such as a flood, fire or other disaster’ 5. There are therefore two questions for the local housing authority:

(1) Is the applicant’s present or threatened homelessness ‘as a result of’ an emergency?

(2) If so, was the emergency one of a relevant type?

1 HA 1996, s 189(1)(d).

Cause and effect

12.127 The ‘emergency’ must cause the actual or prospective loss of accommodation and therefore the current or threatened homelessness. The category is intended to deal with sudden emergencies rather than the loss of accommodation that has been anticipated for some time 6. If the person is already ‘homeless’, in the technical sense used in HA 1996, Pt 7 7, before the emergency occurs, then the homelessness did not result from the emergency. For example, in one case, a caravan-dweller suddenly lost his caravan. But the caravan had been on a site where he had not had permission to station it or occupy it. So he had been homeless when the loss of the caravan occurred. Whilst the sudden loss of his home was ‘an emergency’, it did not cause his homelessness. In another case, a local housing authority’s decision that the applicant had become homeless as a result of the withdrawal of accommodation provided to him as an asylum-seeker, rather than as a result of his losing his home in Darfur, was not wrong in law. He was not therefore homeless as a result of an emergency.

2. As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See Chapter 11.

12.128 On the other hand, if a person loses his or her home as the result of an emergency, it is irrelevant (to the question of priority need) that he or she might have been made homeless anyway at a later date. So, a person who is in no other sense in ‘priority need’ will be within this category if made homeless by an emergency (such as a fire) even if that occurs just before an imminent eviction from his or her accommodation for massive rent or mortgage arrears.

What type of emergency?

12.129 The words used at HA 1996, s 189(1)(d) are ‘emergency such as a flood, fire or other disaster’. The courts have held that this wording means that the emergency must have some physical nature, such as a flood, fire or some similar event. But the flood or fire or other disaster need not have been naturally caused. The person made homeless by flooding from a burst communal water tank is as much in priority need as the person made homeless by reason of sea or river flooding. The person made homeless by an arsonist or by a fire caused by faulty electric wiring is as much in priority need as the victim made homeless by a forest fire or lightning strike. Homelessness caused by a sudden gas leak or explosion is likewise the result of an emergency. A person whose mobile home is stolen from its lawful pitch, site or mooring is also within this provision.

12.130 On the other hand, homelessness resulting from the enforcement of a demolition order is not the result of an emergency. Likewise, an unlawful eviction (where the locks were changed and the applicant’s belongings placed outside) did not constitute some ‘other disaster’ falling within the term ‘emergency’.

1. Noble v South Herefordshire District Council (1985) 17 HLR 80, CA.

2. R v Bristol City Council ex p Bradic (1995) 27 HLR 584, CA.
12.131 Priority Need

12.131 The volcanic eruptions in Montserrat were an obvious example of an 'emergency' that fell within this subsection, and people fleeing from the eruption which caused the loss of their home were found to have a priority need\(^1\). The devastating fire at the Grenfell Tower in West London in June 2017, would be another. Where a person resides in any building which has been made subject to an order of the magistrates’ court under the Greater London Council (General Powers) Act 1984, s 37\(^2\) or s 38\(^3\), he or she is deemed to have a priority need by virtue of an emergency\(^4\).

Additional categories in England: the Priority Need Order

12.132 The Homelessness (Priority Need for Accommodation) (England) Order 2002 (the Order)\(^1\) came into force on 31 July 2002. Under the Order, there are six extra categories of people who have a priority need in addition to the four categories set out in HA 1996, Pt 7\(^2\) itself\(^3\). These additional categories only operate to confer priority need on the applicant personally.

\(^2\) As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

A person aged 16 or 17

12.133 A young person, who is aged 16 or 17\(^1\), has a priority need simply by virtue of his or her age\(^2\). There is no additional requirement that he or she be ‘vulnerable’ or fall into any of the other priority need categories of HA 1996, Pt 7\(^2\), or the Order. There are only two exceptions specified in the Order:

(1) ‘relevant’ children; or
(2) children who ought to be being accommodated by a children’s services authority which owes them duties under the Children Act 1989, s 20.

\(^1\) SI 2002/2051, art 3.
\(^2\) See English Code, paras 8.19–8.23.
\(^3\) As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

Age

12.134 In most cases, the child’s age is unlikely to be in any doubt. If there is doubt, a local housing authority will have to make its own decision on the child’s age, relying on the applicant’s appearance, family and educational background and any ethnic or cultural considerations\(^1\).

\(^1\) R (B) v Merton London Borough Council [2003] EWHC 1689 (Admin), [2003] 4 All R 295. In the context of the provision of accommodation under Children Act 1989, s 20, the Supreme Court has held that if a child disagrees with a children’s services’ authority’s assessment of his or her age, the child can bring judicial review proceedings and, unlike most claims in judicial review, ask the court to review the evidence available and make its own decision as to what age he or she is (R (A) v Croydon London Borough Council, R (M) v Lambeth London Borough Council [2009] UKSC 8, [2009] 1 WLR 2557, SC). The question of how this might fit into the review and appeal provisions of HA 1996, Pt 7, as amended by HRA 2017 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018 (see Chapter 19) is not one that has been addressed by the courts.

In practice the question may be academic as most age disputed minors tend to seek accommodation from children’s services in the first instance. Where children’s services have completed their own age assessment a local housing authority would be entitled to have regard to this.

12.135 The local housing authority must decide whether the child is 16 or 17 at the date of its initial decision or review decision, rather than at the date of application. The Local Government Ombudsman has found maladministration where local housing authorities have refused to help 17-year-olds who were attempting to make applications for homelessness assistance.

1 See Complaint against South Tyneside Metropolitan Borough Council, 04/C/18995, 12 December 2005, where £2,000 compensation was recommended after the local housing authority failed to give a 17-year-old a homeless application form to complete or provide him with any interim accommodation. He returned after two months, by which time he had turned 18 and no longer had a priority need.

12.136 What should happen when a 17-year-old, approaching his or her eighteenth birthday, makes an application for homelessness assistance? The Court of Appeal considered these circumstances in Robinson v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council. Although the guidance given in that case pre-dates the amendments to HA 1996, Pt 7 introduced by HRA 2017, it remains relevant for any local housing authority considering whether or not a 17-year-old applicant has a priority need and what further duty (if any) he or she will be owed when the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty comes to an end. The guidance given by the Court of Appeal was in three parts.

2 For applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
3 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

12.137 First, the making of decisions on applications for homelessness assistance should not be postponed. The issue of the applicant’s priority need is a very straightforward question of fact, which would not normally take much time to determine. The Court of Appeal said:

‘in the case of a 17-year-old child, it would not . . . be lawful for a local authority to postpone the taking of a decision even for a short period on the basis that by postponing that decision the child will have reached the age of 18 before the decision is taken.’

1 English Code, para 8.4 and 14.16.
2 Robinson v Hammersmith & Fulham London Borough Council [2006] EWCA Civ 1122, [2007] HLR 7, CA per Waller LJ at [38]. See also R (MM) v Lewisham London Borough Council [2009] EWHC 416 (Admin), (2009) April Legal Action, p 23, Admin Ct, where the local housing authority simply failed to make a decision on an application from a 17-year-old for over four months. The Administrative Court judge said, ‘I would urge the defendant to take action to ensure that . . . steps are taken to ensure that the imminence of a child attaining 18 years is not taken as a basis for failing to take action and ... there is due and proper contact between its housing authority and its social services authority.

Second, a local housing authority cannot find that a young person approaching his or her eighteenth birthday does not have a priority need because he or she is 'so nearly 18 that the difference between 18 and 17, should be ignored'. If, at the date of the decision, the young person is, as a matter of fact, 17 (even if the following day is his or her eighteenth birthday), he or she has a priority need.

Third, where the young person requests a review of any negative decision, but turns 18 before the review is concluded, it is not lawful for the local housing authority simply to state that, at the date of the review decision, the young person does not have a priority need:

‘if the original decision was unlawful ... the review decision should have so held and made a decision that would have restored to the appellant the rights she would have had if the decision had been lawful’.

The exceptions

Both of the exceptions to this category are designed to ensure that young people to whom children’s services have owed duties in the past, or do owe a present duty to accommodate by virtue of Children Act 1989, s 20, should be the responsibility of children’s services. This is because young people in those circumstances are likely to have needs over and above the simple need for a roof over their heads, and those needs are best met by children’s services.

As Baroness Hale put it in the House of Lords:

‘It is, perhaps, possible to envisage circumstances in which a 16 or 17 year old who is temporarily without accommodation is nevertheless not in need within the meaning of section 17(10): perhaps a child whose home has been temporarily damaged by fire or flood who can well afford hotel accommodation while it is repaired ... But it cannot seriously be suggested that a child excluded from home who is “sofa surfing” in this way, more often sleeping in cars, snatching showers and washing his clothes when he can, is not in need’.

on the facts of that particular case when it decided that a pregnant 16-year-old was not a child in need.

12.141 Following the two significant House of Lords’ decisions on the housing needs of 16- and 17-year-olds\(^1\), the UK Government issued statutory guidance in April 2010: Provision of Accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless and/or require accommodation. This was replaced in April 2018 by Prevention of homelessness and provision of accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless and/or require accommodation (the Homeless 16/17 guidance)\(^2\). The guidance reinforces the decisions of the House of Lords: the duty ‘under section 20 of the 1989 [Children] Act . . . takes precedence over the duties in the 1996 [Housing] Act’\(^3\), and so primary responsibility for homeless teenagers will lie with children’s services.

3. April 2018, MHCLG and DfE. HA 1996, s 182 requires that local housing authorities take the guidance into account when exercising their HA 1996 Pt 7 functions. Similarly, the Local Authority Social Services Act 1970, s 7 requires children’s services’ departments to take the guidance into account when exercising children’s services’ functions. See 12.151–12.159.

4. Homeless 16/17 guidance, para 1.2.

12.142 The case law and government guidance have all emphasised joint working between local housing authorities and children’s services. However, investigations by Shelter\(^1\) and the magazine Inside Housing\(^2\) have found that ‘a substantial number of vulnerable children are still suffering from a failure of co-ordination between these two departments within a number of local authorities’ in England\(^3\). The issue of joint working is explored further at 12.150–12.159.

2. ‘Who Cares?’, Inside Housing, 7 January 2011. See also No excuses: preventing homelessness for the next generation (Homeless Link, 2013), ‘Councils illegally housing teenagers in B&Bs’, BBC Newsnight, 29 August 2013, Complaint against Kent County Council 09/017/510, Complaint against Dover District Council 09/017/512, 31 July 2012 (case of a 17-year-old who spent nine months living in a tent), ‘From Pillar to Post’, Inside Housing, 21 June 2013 and ‘Homeless teenagers failed by councils’, Inside Housing, 21 June 2013. The latter investigation found that in the first seven months of 2012, 59% (3,418) of 5,789 teenagers who approached 112 councils were sent straight to housing departments rather than children’s services.

Relevant child

12.143 A 16- or 17-year-old does not have automatic priority need if he or she is ‘a relevant child’, defined by the Children Act 1989, s 23A(2), as any child, aged 16 or 17, who was formerly being looked after by any local authority for a prescribed period of time while of a prescribed age, but who is no longer being looked after\(^1\). This exception, as described in the English Code\(^2\), is satisfied only if:
12.143 Priority Need

(1) the child is 16 or 17; and
(2) the child was ‘looked after’ by a children’s services authority:
   (a) for at least 13 weeks,
   (b) after the age of 14; and
(3) has been looked after while he or she was 16 or 17; and
(4) is no longer being looked after.

2 English Code, para 8.21.
3 See 12.149.

12.144 As the English Code itself foreshadows, each of these elements is subject to close technical definition in the Children Act 1989 (as amended) and in the Care Leavers (England) Regulations 2010. If the terms of the exception appear to be satisfied, the local housing authority should obviously refer to the precise wording of the Children Act 1989 and the regulations to confirm the actual position. Although the Code recommends joint working between the local housing authority and children’s services, the decision as to whether the child meets the technical definition of ‘relevant child’ is for the local housing authority to make and not for children’s services to decide.

A child owed duties under the Children Act 1989, s 20

12.145 A 16- or 17-year-old does not have automatic priority need if she or he is a person to whom a children’s services authority ‘owe a duty to provide accommodation’ under the Children Act 1989, s 20. Note that the exception only applies if the duty is owed (that is, currently owed). That the duty was owed in the past or might be owed in the future is irrelevant, save to the extent that a child who was owed a duty under Children Act 1989, s 20 in the past may be a relevant child. A children’s services authority is not obliged to notify a decision that it owes a young person the duty under Children Act 1989, s 20 in writing, so there is unlikely to be a convenient short-cut for inquiries by simply requesting sight of such a document.

1 SI 2001/2051, art 3(2).
2 See 12.143–12.144.

12.146 Children owed duties under the Children Act 1989, s 20 are those children who appear to a children’s services authority to require accommodation either:

(1) because they are 16 or over and their welfare is otherwise likely to be seriously prejudiced; or
(2) because they have no parents or other people who are able to provide accommodation for them.

12.147 Where a child has been provided with accommodation by children’s services, there may be some doubt as to whether that accommodation was provided under the duty at Children Act 1989, s 20, or the power at Children Act 1989, s 17. The courts have held that where accommodation has been provided as a result of a young person falling within the test at Children Act, s 20, the local authority cannot side-step its responsibility by recording or arguing that it was in fact acting under the Children Act 1989, s 17 power or some other legislation. Equally, the children’s services authority cannot side-step its responsibility by telling a child aged 16 or 17 who falls within the criteria at Children Act 1989, s 20 to make an application for homelessness assistance.

Children’s services’ duties towards relevant children and ‘looked after’ children

12.148 The thrust of the amendments made to the Children Act 1989 by the Children (Leaving Care) Act 2000 is that children’s services authorities should be responsible for meeting the accommodation and other needs of young people who have been in, but are no longer in, the care system (at least until they reach 18), or who have been ‘looked after’ under Children Act 1989, s 20. To accord such 16- and 17-year-olds priority need would shift the responsibility for accommodating young people on to local housing authorities when children’s services should be arranging accommodation. This policy aim is reinforced by the Homeless 16/17 guidance.

12.149 Where a child is in the care of a local authority, or is accommodated under the Children Act 1989, s 20 for a continuous period of more than 24 hours, he or she then becomes a ‘looked after’ child. The children’s services authority is then responsible for safeguarding and promoting the child’s welfare, including his or her educational achievement, and for maintaining the child in other respects apart from providing accommodation. In addition, if the ‘looked after’ 16- or 17-year-old has been looked after by the children’s services authority for a total of 13 weeks or more at any time since the age of 14, he or she is entitled to services under the Children (Leaving Care) Act 2000. Those services include an assessment of the child’s future needs, preparation of a detailed pathway plan for him or her, and a personal adviser. The services may continue until the young person reaches the age of 25. It is precisely because of these obligations of children’s services towards 16- and 17-year-olds that the exceptions to this priority need category have been made.
12.149 Priority Need

Joint Working between Housing and Children’s Services

12.150 The English Code recommends that local housing authorities and children’s services agree written joint protocols, in respect of 16- and 17-year-olds, setting out ‘clear, practical arrangements for providing services that are centered on young people and their families and prevent young people from being passed over and back between housing and children’s services authorities’. This reflects the House of Lords’ view that, when a 16- or 17-year-old presents himself or herself to the housing department as homeless, the housing department must make a referral to the children’s services department as part of its ongoing inquiries into whether or not the young person has a priority need, or is a relevant child or is owed a Children Act 1989, s 20 duty. The children’s services department should then carry out its own assessment in accordance with its responsibilities under the Children Act 1989. It is because ‘relevant children’ and children entitled to a Children Act 1989, s 20 duty have needs over and above the simple need for a roof over their heads that the Priority Need Order clearly contemplates that children’s services should take the long term responsibility.

1 English Code, para 8.23.

12.151 The Homeless 16/17 guidance, also emphasises the need for a joint approach, underpinned by a joint protocol, to prevent 16- and 17-year-olds in crisis from being passed between housing and children’s services departments unnecessarily. The Guidance addresses various scenarios that housing and children’s services departments may encounter when approached by a 16- or 17-year-old who may be homeless.

1 Homeless 16/17 guidance, Chapter 6.

12.152 To facilitate joint working, children’s services may ask local housing authorities to ‘help in the exercise of any of their functions’ under Children Act 1989 and local housing authorities are required to comply with the request where possible. Similarly local housing authorities can ask children’s services authorities to assist them in discharging their functions under HA 1996, Pt 7, and children’s services authorities should co-operate by rendering such assistance as is reasonable in the circumstances.

1 Children Act 1989, s 27. This duty to cooperate does not apply in circumstances where the local housing authority and children’s services form a part of the same unitary authority. See...
England 12.155

However, the guidance issued by the Secretary of State in Working Together to Safeguard Children (HM Government, March 2015), requires a similar degree of co-operation between departments in the same authority. See R (M) v Islington London Borough Council [2016] EWHC 332 (Admin), [2016] HLR 19, Admin Ct per Collins J at [14]–[15].

As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

Initial approach made to the local housing authority

12.153 Where the young person first approaches the local housing authority, it has a duty to accept an application for homelessness assistance, to make inquiries into that application and to secure interim accommodation where there is reason to believe that the young person may be eligible for assistance, may be homeless and may be 16 or 17 years old. The Homeless 16/17 guidance advises that bed and breakfast accommodation is unsuitable for 16- and 17-year-olds.

1 HA 1996, s 188(1) as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(4) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See also Homeless 16/17 guidance, paras 4.1–4.2.

2 Homeless 16/17 guidance, para 5.10. See also Complaint against Lancashire County Council, 13 020 158, 5 August 2015, where Lancashire County Council placed a 16-year old in bed and breakfast accommodation following his release on bail, in breach of the guidance and against the recommendation of the Youth Offending Team. The Ombudsman made a finding of ‘fault causing injustice’.

12.154 The local housing authority should then make a referral to children’s services for an assessment. The Homeless 16/17 guidance emphasises that this referral should be made in a ‘timely manner’ and that, in those cases where the young person is not eligible for assistance or is a relevant child, ‘immediate arrangements must be made for them to receive assistance from children’s services’.

1 Homeless 16/17 guidance, paras 4.4–4.6, 4.13 and 4.14. Guidance on the approach to be taken in circumstances where the young person is reluctant to engage with this process is given at para 4.7. Consent for a referral in the other direction is dealt with expressly by HA 1996, s 213B as inserted by HRA 2017, s 10 for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 Homeless 16/17 guidance, para 4.4.

3 See 12.143–12.144.

4 Homeless 16/17 guidance, para 4.5.

12.155 The duties owed by the local housing authority do not end upon the making of the referral to children’s services. Having accepted an application for homelessness assistance, the local housing authority must still make inquiries into the application and notify the applicant of its decision. If these inquiries lead the local housing authority to conclude that the young person is eligible for assistance and threatened with homelessness the HA 1996, s 195(2) prevention duty (to take reasonable steps to help the applicant secure that suitable accommodation does not cease to be available for his or her occupation) will be owed. Alternatively if the inquiries lead to the conclusion that the young person is eligible for assistance and homeless then the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty (to take reasonable steps to help the applicant secure that suitable accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation) will be owed. In either case the young person will also be entitled to an assessment of his case and a personalised housing plan under HA 1996, s 189A. In broad terms, the Homeless 16/17 guidance anticipates that these various duties may be discharged by the local housing authority co-operating with children’s services to ensure that suitable accommodation is provided by children’s services. But until that occurs the young person, if homeless, will need to be accommodated by the local housing authority. Once the HA 1996 s 195(2) prevention duty or s 189B(2) relief duty have come to an end, the local housing authority will need to make a decision as to what, if any, duty is owed next. Where children’s services, having carried out their assessment of the young person’s needs, have decided that he or she is a child in need of accommodation, they have a duty under Children Act 1989, s 20 to provide accommodation. Since a child who has been provided with accommodation under Children Act 1989, s 20 will no longer be homeless the local housing authority can simply notify the applicant of its decision that he or she is not homeless and that no duty is owed. Alternatively, if children's services have concluded that they do not owe the young person a duty, then he or she will have a priority need and ‘housing services duties under Part 7 of the 1996 Act will continue’.

Initial approach made to children’s services

12.156 Where a 16- or 17-year-old first approaches children’s services, either directly or through a referral by another agency, and he or she appears to be homeless or at risk of homelessness, children’s services must assess whether the young person is a child in need and whether any duty is owed to him or her to provide accommodation under Children Act 1989. If it appears that the young person has nowhere safe to stay that night, children’s services must secure suitable emergency accommodation for him or her. Bed and breakfast accommodation is not considered suitable accommodation, even for emergencies. Children’s services should also, with the young person’s consent, refer his or her case to the local housing authority under HA 1996, s 213B. The referral should include a summary of any initial assessment together with an indication of what assistance, if any, housing services might provide. When the local housing authority receives a referral from children’s services the two services should work together to ensure that the needs of the young person are met. The making of this referral ‘does not diminish children’s services responsibilities’ rather ‘it should be used to help strengthen communication between children’s and housing services’.

12.157 The Homeless 16/17 guidance advises that where a young person requires accommodation as a result of one of the factors at Children Act 1989, s 20(1)(a)–(c) or (3), then that young person must be provided with accommodation by children’s services. This is not ‘simply a matter for local policy’. That young person then, after a period of 24-hours, becomes a ‘looked after’ child and will be entitled to all the duties owed to looked-after children. The acceptance of the duty under Children Act 1989, s 20 means that the young person will not have a priority need under the Priority Need Order.

1 Homeless 16/17 guidance, para 3.12.
2 Homeless 16/17 guidance, para 3.11.
4 Art 3(2), SI 2002/2051.

12.158 If the young person refuses accommodation offered under Children Act 1989, s 20, children’s services must be clear that his or her decision has been reached after having been provided with ‘all relevant information’ and that she or he is competent to make the decision. Once accommodation has been lost because the young person has refused it, and he or she does not have any other accommodation, he or she will be homeless within the definition at HA 1996, ss 175–177. In these circumstances, once again, children’s services would need to refer the young person’s case, with his her consent, to the local housing authority under HA 1996, s 213B. Upon receipt of the referral, the local housing authority should then make its inquiries and notify the young person of its decision. Providing the young person is eligible for assistance then he or she will be owed the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty. A young person in these circumstances will also have a priority need and should not be considered to have become homeless intentionally simply because of failing to take up an offer of accommodation from children’s services. This means that if the young person remains homeless at the time the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty comes to an end, then the local housing authority will owe him or her the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty.

The Court of Appeal rejected a contention by the City of Westminster that the applicant was not homeless.

12.159 Where accommodation is provided to the young person under one of the duties in HA 1996 Pt 7, that is not necessarily the end of children’s services’ responsibilities. They should consider whether the child is still ‘a child in need’ and, if so, produce a child in need plan setting out the services that will be provided in order to meet his or her needs.

A young person under 21

12.160 A young person who:

• is under 21; and
• was looked after, accommodated or fostered at any time between the ages of 16–18;

will have a priority need provided that he or she is not a ‘relevant student’. In non-technical language, the criteria are likely to be fulfilled by recent care leavers who are not yet 21. If the applicant falls within this priority need category, he or she does not also need to be ‘vulnerable’ or fall into any other category.

12.161 The term ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’ takes its meaning from the Children Act 1989, s 24(2). It encompasses those who have been:

• looked after by a local authority;
• accommodated by or on behalf of a voluntary organisation;
• accommodated in a private children’s home;
• accommodated for a consecutive period of at least three months:
  • by a local health board, special health authority or by a local authority in the exercise of education functions; or
England 12.164

- in any care home or independent hospital or in any accommodation provided pursuant to arrangements made under the National Health Service Act 2006 by a National Health Service trust or an NHS foundation trust, or by a local authority in Wales in the exercise of education functions; or
- privately fostered.

A child will have been ‘looked after’ by a local authority if he or she was:

- in its care; or
- provided with accommodation by the local authority in the exercise of any of its social services functions (within the meaning the Local Authority Social Services Act 1970) apart from Children Act 1989, ss 17, 23B and 24B;

for a continuous period of more than 24 hours.

3. Children Act 1989, s 24(2). See also English Code, para 8.28.
4. Children Act 1989, s 22(1)–(2). See also R (Berhe) v Hillingdon London Borough Council and Secretary of State for Education and Skills [2003] EWHC 2075 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 01 Sep, Admin Ct, for an example of a dispute over whether children provided with accommodation by children’s services had been ‘looked after’.

12.162 As long as the applicant was ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’ at some stage when he or she was 16, 17 or 18 years old, the criteria will be met. No minimum period of time during which he or she was ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’ is prescribed.

12.163 Many of these former care leavers will be owed duties of support by children’s services under Children Act 1989, ss 23C–24D including the duty to prepare and review a pathway plan, and to appoint a personal adviser. Where a care leaver falls within this category but is not owed the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty, for example because he or she has become homeless intentionally, he or she may be entitled to accommodation under Children Act 1989, s 23C(4)(c).

1. Children Act 1989, ss 23C–24D.

12.164 The exception to this category of priority need is where the applicant is a ‘relevant student’. That term is only met by a person:

1. who is a care leaver;
2. who is under 25;
3. to whom s 24B(3) of the Children Act 1989 applies;
4. who is in full time higher or further education; and
5. whose term time accommodation is unavailable during vacation.

2. SI 2002/2051, art 1(3). See also English Code, para 8.29.
12.165 Priority Need

12.165 Children’s services authorities continue to have duties to provide accommodation to those young people who meet these very specific conditions, and for that reason they are not accorded priority need under this provision\(^1\). However, an applicant for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England who is a ‘relevant student’ should not simply be turned away to the children’s services authority which should be accommodating them. The appropriate course would be to accept the application, make due inquiries and refer the applicant to children’s services in performance of the HA 1996, s 189B(2)\(^2\) relief duty.

\(^1\) Children Act 1989, s 24B(5).

\(^2\) As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138–15.189.

Vulnerability: institutional backgrounds

12.166 People applying to local housing authorities in England who are ‘vulnerable’ as a result of:
- having been ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’ (and who are aged 21 or over and not ‘relevant students’); or
- having been a member of Her Majesty’s regular naval, military or air forces; or
- having served a custodial sentence, been committed for contempt of court or other kindred offences, or having been remanded in custody, all have a priority need\(^2\). Each sub-category is described in more detail in the following paragraphs.

\(^1\) See 12.171.

\(^2\) SI 2002/2051, art 5.

12.167 To qualify, the applicant must be ‘vulnerable’ as defined in Hotak, Johnson and Kanu. So, simply having been in the military, in care, or in prison is not enough. The applicant must be vulnerable, and that vulnerability must be the result, in whole or in part, of having been in care, in custody or in the military.

12.168 The provisions do not require any immediate link between the end of military service, imprisonment or care and the application for homelessness assistance. They direct attention to the present vulnerability of the applicant. Although a person may be particularly vulnerable when first released, discharged, or at the point of leaving care, that may not be the only time at which he or she experiences relevant vulnerability. The provisions of the English Priority Need Order\(^1\) will be met by any current vulnerability that is the result of the experience of a period in care, in the military or in prison, even if that period ended many months or years earlier.

\(^1\) SI 2002/2051, art 5.
12.169 Unlike the category of ‘vulnerable’ persons set out in HA 1996, s 189(1)(c) this category of priority need can only be satisfied if the applicant personally is vulnerable for these reasons. A member of the applicant’s household who is vulnerable as a result of one of these reasons does not confer priority need on the applicant. Obviously, in those circumstances, it would make sense for the vulnerable individual to apply in his or her own right for accommodation for his or her household.

A former care leaver aged 21 or over

12.170 The local housing authority must address the following questions¹:

1. Is the person aged 21 or over?
2. Was he or she formerly looked after, accommodated or fostered?
3. Is he or she a relevant student?
4. Is he or she vulnerable?
5. Is that vulnerability as a result of having been looked after, accommodated or fostered?²

¹ SI 2002/2051, art 5(1). English Code, paras 8.28–8.31 and 22.20–22.23
² English Code, para 8.27.

12.171 The meanings of ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’ and ‘relevant student’ are defined in the English Priority Need Order. If the applicant is a ‘relevant student’ he or she cannot qualify under this category.

12.172 Unlike the category of care leavers aged 18, 19 and 20¹, there is no requirement, for those aged 21 or over, that their period in care should have been at any particular age. The effects of a traumatic period in care (at any age) may only manifest themselves later in life.

12.173 The first three questions are therefore simple questions of fact for the local housing authority to determine. By contrast, determining:

1. whether the applicant is vulnerable; and
2. whether that vulnerability is as a result of having been ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’, require much more difficult judgments. The English Code recommends that local housing authorities consider:

1. the length of time that the applicant was ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’;
2. the reasons why the applicant was ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’;
3. the length of time since that ended;
4. whether the applicant has been able to obtain or maintain accommodation since then; and
5. whether the applicant has existing support networks, particularly family, friends or a mentor.
12.173 Priority Need

The English Code also emphasises that particular care should be taken in assessing those who may potentially fall within this class and that local housing authorities ‘should take into account whether, if homeless, they would be at particular risk of exploitation, abuse or involvement in offending behaviour’.

1 English Code, para 22.22.
2 English Code, para 22.23.

A person who is vulnerable as a result of having been a member of the armed forces 12.174 The questions for the local housing authority are:

1. Was the applicant a member of the armed forces?
2. Is he or she vulnerable?
3. Is that vulnerability as a result of having been a member of the armed forces?

12.175 The first question is a very straightforward question of fact, although military service is very broadly defined. The English Priority Need Order1 refers to membership of ‘Her Majesty’s regular naval, military or air forces’ without linking back to the much more technical definition previously used in HA 1996, s 199(4).2 It is difficult to see how the words could be met by a person who has been in anything other than the British armed services.

1 SI 2002/2051.
2 Repealed by Housing and Regeneration Act 2008, ss 315((b), 321(1), Sch 16.

12.176 The next question is whether a person is ‘vulnerable’ as defined in Hotak, Johnson and Kanu’.

12.177 The final question is whether the applicant is vulnerable as a result of time spent in the armed forces. Local housing authorities are advised to consider:

1. the length of time spent in the forces (they should not assume that vulnerability cannot occur after even a short period of service);
2. the type of service that the applicant was engaged in (those on active service might find it more difficult to cope with civilian life);
3. whether the applicant spent any time in a military hospital (possibly an indicator of a serious health problem or of post-traumatic stress);
4. whether the forces’ medical and welfare advisers judged the individual to be particularly vulnerable and issued a Medical History Release Form;
5. the length of time since discharge; and
6. whether the applicant has any existing support networks, particularly family or friends.

1. English Code, para 24.10.

12.178 Some applicants (who have served for a long period or who have been medically discharged) ought to have been offered assistance with resettlement by the armed forces. This does not mean that they are to be turned away by the local housing authority or redirected to their former unit. In any event, such assistance from the armed forces is directed to the point of discharge, not to any later need for accommodation.

1. English Code, para 24.5.

12.179 The H(W)A 2014, s 70 does not contain the additional requirement of vulnerability. Former members of the armed forces who may not be vulnerable might consider directing an application (or a further application) to a local housing authority in Wales.

1. See 12.77–12.91.

A former prisoner who is vulnerable

12.180 The questions for the local housing authority in dealing with an applicant who may fall within this category follow the same pattern as described for the previous two categories:

1. Is he or she vulnerable?

2. If so, is the vulnerability as a result of having served a custodial sentence, having been committed for contempt of court (or other kindred offences), or having been remanded in custody?

12.181 The term ‘custodial sentence’ is defined to include:

• a sentence of imprisonment for those aged 21 or over;
• a sentence of detention for those aged under 18;
• a sentence of detention for public protection for those under 18 who commit serious offences;
• a sentence of detention for those under 18 who commit certain violent or sexual offences;
• a sentence of custody for life for persons under 21;
• a sentence of detention in a young offender institution for those aged between 18 and 21; and
• a detention and training order.

1. Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 76; the references to sentence of custody for life and sentences of detention in a young offender institution are due to be repealed by the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, but no date for their repeal has yet been appointed (Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, s 80(1)).

12.182 Being ‘committed for contempt of court’ refers to punishment under the inherent jurisdiction of the court to commit, and ‘other kindred offences’ refers to committals under the court’s statutory powers. Being ‘remanded in custody’ refers to being remanded by an order of the court, being remanded to youth detention accommodation under the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012, s 91(4), or being remanded, admitted or removed to hospital under the sentences available under the Mental Health Act 1983.

1 Such as that at County Courts Act 1984, s 118.
2 Referred to in the Order as being defined by the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 88. That section has been repealed and the definition is now found at Criminal Justice Act 2003, s 242(2). The references to the Mental Health Act 1983 are to the powers at ss 35, 36, 38 or 48, Mental Health Act 1983.

12.183 The English Code recommends that, in determining ‘vulnerability’, and whether it is the result of imprisonment or custody, local housing authorities should consider:

(1) the length of time served (it should not be assumed that vulnerability could not occur as a result of a short period of imprisonment);
(2) whether the applicant is receiving supervision from a criminal justice agency and any advice received from such an agency;
(3) the length of time since release;
(4) the extent to which the applicant has been able to obtain and maintain accommodation during that time; and
(5) whether the applicant has existing support networks, particularly family or friends, and how much of a positive influence those networks are likely to be.

1 English Code, para 23.19.

12.184 In one county court decision, the judge found that the local housing authority had been wrong to reject the opinion of a prison officer that the applicant was institutionalised, and had also been wrong to find that the applicant had a history of managing to secure housing when, in fact, his only accommodation in recent years had been insecure accommodation with a friend and he had previously been recalled to prison because he had not managed to secure housing.

1 The English Code, para 23.20 now expressly recommends that the assessments of offender managers and the like are taken into account.

12.185 Former prisoners who have a priority need for this reason may still be found to have become homeless intentionally by the local housing authority if their homelessness arose as a result of their deliberate acts or omissions (which led them to prison and to lose their previous accommodation).

12.186 There is a considerable body of literature on some of the problems faced by ex-offenders in trying to find accommodation on their release from prison. The importance of this category of priority need arises from the close link between homelessness and offending. According to a survey conducted by the Ministry of Justice, 15% of prisoners surveyed reported being homeless before custody and 60% of prisoners felt that having a place to live following release was important in stopping them reoffending in future.

For example, Locked Out (Citizens' Advice Bureau, March 2007); Homelessness Prevention and meeting housing need for ex-offenders: a Guide to Good Practice (CLG, 2009); Accommodation, Homelessness and re-offending of prisoners, results from the surveying prisoner crime reduction survey (Ministry of Justice, 2012); Finding and Sustaining a Home in the Private Rented Sector – the essentials a guide for front-line staff working with homeless offenders (Crisis, 2012); Housing Ex-offenders (House of Commons Library, SN/SP/2989, 16 April 2014); Homelessness prevention for care leavers, prison leavers and survivors of domestic violence (APPG for Ending Homelessness, July 2017).

A person who is vulnerable as a result of fleeing violence or threats of violence

The questions for the local housing authority when dealing with an applicant who may fall within this category are:

1. Did the person cease to occupy accommodation as a result of violence from another person or threats of violence from another person which were likely to be carried out?
2. Is the person vulnerable?
3. Is that vulnerability as a result of having ceased to occupy accommodation because of violence from another person or threats of violence from another person which were likely to be carried out?

Although this category was intended primarily to benefit people without children who had been subject to domestic violence, its terms include people fleeing accommodation as a result of any type of violence (except self-inflicted harm). The English Code refers to all forms of violence, including racially motivated violence. The Supreme Court has held that where violence is ‘domestic violence’, the definition of violence should be interpreted in the same sense as it is used in family proceedings: “Domestic violence” includes physical violence, threatening or intimidating behaviour and any other form of abuse which, directly or indirectly may give rise to the risk of harm.

This approach is reflected in the English Code. The Court of Appeal has held that this extended definition of violence should also apply to people who are fleeing from violence that is not domestic violence.

The English Code recommends that:
12.189 Priority Need

- the safety of the applicant and ensuring his or her confidentiality are of paramount concern;
- inquiries should not be made of the perpetrator; and
- the correct approach is to consider the probability of violence, and not actions which the applicant could take (such as injunctions against the perpetrators).

12.190 This reflects the approach taken in relation to the question whether it would be reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy accommodation in which violence is being experienced or threatened.

1 See 10.81–10.91.

12.191 In considering whether an applicant is vulnerable for this reason, local housing authorities are advised to take into account:

(1) the nature of the violence or threats (whether a single but significant incident or a number of incidents over an extended period of time which have a cumulative effect);
(2) the impact and likely effects of the violence or threats on the applicant’s physical and mental health and well-being;
(3) whether the applicant has any existing support networks, particularly by way of family or friends; and
(4) the continuing threat from the perpetrator.

1 English Code, para 21.34.

12.192 Considering an applicant who claimed to have left his home because of threats of violence, a county court judge held that the local housing authority should consider the following:

- Did the applicant leave his or her home due to threats?
- Were those threats likely to be carried out?
- Was he or she vulnerable?

In relation to the third question, the judge held that a person who is subject to threats of violence, and who is street homeless, is less likely to be able to protect himself or herself.

1 Not domestic violence.

12.193 To qualify under this category, the applicant must have actually left accommodation and have left it because of the violence or threatened violence. This need not be, but is very likely to have been, the accommodation which he or she had most recently occupied.

12.194 The H(W)A 2014, s 70 does not contain the additional requirement of vulnerability. A person who has been subject to domestic abuse who is not vulnerable and does not have a dependent child might consider directing an application for homelessness assistance (or a further application) to a local housing authority in Wales.

Wales 12.197

The statutory categories in H(W)A 2014, s 70

12.195 In Wales, the categories of priority need are wholly contained in H(W)A 2014, s 70. This section codifies, with some amendments, the four categories set out in HA 1996, s 189(1) and those six categories which, prior to the coming into force of H(W)A 2014, were set out in the Homeless Persons (Priority Need) (Wales) Order 2001. With the exception of the category relating to prisoners, the intention behind H(W)A 2014, s 70 was to consolidate the existing categories, modernising the language where appropriate, rather than to effect any substantial change to the law.

2 See 12.223–12.228.

12.196 In contrast to the position for applicants to local housing authorities in England, in each of the categories under H(W)A 2012, s 70 an applicant will have a priority need if either he or she, or any person with whom he or she resides or might reasonably be expected to reside, falls within the relevant category. The categories are set out below. There is considerable overlap with the categories under HA 1996, s 189(1) and reference back to the relevant sections is made where appropriate.

1 See H(W)A 2014, s 76 and 10.21–10.32.

Pregnancy

12.197 This category corresponds precisely with HA 1996, s 189(1)(a). The Welsh Code advises local housing authorities that in the event that a pregnant woman suffers a miscarriage or terminates her pregnancy during the assessment of her application, then the local housing authority should consider whether she continues to have a priority need for any other reason, for example, on the basis that she is vulnerable within the meaning of H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(c).

1 H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(a). See also Welsh Code, para 16.3.
3 Welsh Code, para 16.5.
12.198 Priority Need

Dependent child

12.198 Aside from a minor variation in the wording, this category corresponds precisely with HA 1996, s 189(1)(b).1

1 The singular ‘child’ has been used in H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(b), rather than ‘children’. The distinction is of no practical effect since words in the singular include the plural and vice versa (Interpretation Act 1978, s 6(c)).

3 See 12.41–12.75.

Vulnerable

12.199 An applicant, or a person with whom he or she resides or might reasonably be expected to reside will fall within this category if he or she is vulnerable as a result of some special reason (eg old age, physical or mental illness or physical or mental disability).1

The statutory causes of vulnerability

12.200 Under H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(c) the statutory causes of vulnerability are old age, physical or mental illness and physical or mental disability. This list of statutory causes is expressed to be non-exhaustive meaning that a person may be vulnerable as a result of any one of the specified statutory causes or as a result of another unspecified special reason.1 This may be contrasted with HA 1996, s 189(1)(c), where ‘special reason’ is a distinct statutory cause of vulnerability separate to the express statutory causes of old age, physical disability or mental illness etc. It seems unlikely that this minor change in the phraseology was intended to have any effect as the objective underpinning H(W)A 2014, s 70 was to consolidate the existing categories of priority need, modernising the language where appropriate, rather than to effect any substantial change to the law.2

12.201 Guidance is given in the Welsh Code on the assessment of individuals who may be vulnerable as a result of old age, mental or physical illness or disability (including autistic spectrum disorder), as well as those who are in receipt of psychiatric services, the chronically sick, victims of abuse, rough sleepers and former asylum seekers. In relation to old age the Welsh Code advises that ‘Authorities should normally consider applicants over 60 to be vulnerable’. While in relation to rough sleepers, the Welsh Code directs that ‘people who are sleeping rough are likely to be vulnerable due to the health and social implications of their situation’.3

1 Welsh Code, para 16.20.
4 Welsh Code, para 16.27.
5 Welsh Code, para 16.28.
The meaning of ‘vulnerable’

12.202 Unlike HA 1996, Pt 7, H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 contains a definition of vulnerable at H(W)A 2014, s 71. A person will be deemed to be vulnerable if he or she:

- would be less able to fend for himself or herself if the person were to become street homeless than would an ordinary homeless person who becomes street homeless; and
- this reduced ability is the result of some special reason (eg old age, physical or mental illness or physical or mental disability); and
- this would lead to the person suffering more harm than would be suffered by the ordinary homeless person.

As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 H(W)A 2014, s 71(1).

12.203 This is the test for vulnerability under H(W)A 2014, s 71 represents the statutory codification of the Pereira test. The comparison with the ‘ordinary homeless person’ under H(W)A 2014, s 71 is to be contrasted with the ‘ordinary person who is homeless’, which is the relevant comparator under HA 1996, s 189(1)(c) following the decision of the Supreme Court in Hotak, Johnson and Kanu. However, the Welsh Code makes clear that while local housing authorities should use the ‘ordinary homeless person’ as the comparator, the ‘ordinary homeless person’ should not be equated with a ‘chronic rough sleeper with the associated social, mental and physical health problems that they can display’. From this it might be inferred that the ordinary homeless person is a person who does not suffer from these problems. Building on this, the Welsh Code advises that ‘people who are sleeping rough are likely to be very vulnerable due to the health and social implications of their situation’.

3 Welsh Code, para 16.73.

4 Welsh Code, para 16.29.

12.204 ‘Street homeless’ in the context of H(W)A 2014, s 71, means that the person has no accommodation available for his or her occupation in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, which the person:

- is entitled to occupy by virtue of an interest in it or by virtue of an order of a court;
- has an express or implied licence to occupy; or
12.204 Priority Need

- occupies as a residence by virtue of any enactment or rule of law giving the person the right to remain in occupation or restricting the right of another person to recover possession

The extended definition of homelessness at H(W)A 2014, ss 55–56 does not apply to the definition of 'street homeless'. That is, the test for vulnerability envisions that the person in question, literally, has no accommodation available. Whether or not the person actually is, or is likely to become, street homeless has no bearing on the application of the test for vulnerability.

12.205 Since the test for vulnerability under H(W)A 2014, s 71 codifies the Pereira test, the correct approach to vulnerability under this section might be assumed to mirror the approach to vulnerability adopted under HA 1996, s 189(1)(c) prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in Hotak, Johnson and Kanu. For example, in Pereira it was said that the material sense in which the person must be less well able to 'fend' for himself or herself is in coping with his or her actual (or threatened) homelessness. Obviously, that test will be satisfied by a person whose circumstances are such that he or she is not able to obtain housing unaided and is thus unable to deal with homelessness in the ordinary way. There need not be actual injury or detriment. An increase in the risk of injury or other harm is itself a 'detriment'. Injury or detriment can include physical injury, a deterioration of a person’s mental condition, or the risk of self-harm.

12.206 However, in some respects the guidance in the Welsh Code has sought to reflect the guidance given in Hotak, Johnson and Kanu. For example the Welsh Code emphasises that local housing authorities should not simply ‘compare the vulnerable with the vulnerable’ in carrying out the comparative exercise and should only take into account third-party support where it is available on a consistent and predictable basis. Giving an overview of the approach to be taken in assessing vulnerability the relevant sections of the Welsh Code conclude by advising that:

‘In order to establish the basis of this test the Local Authority must first understand the likely harm or detriment an ordinary homeless person would face if they were to become street homeless and their ability to fend for themselves. This should be based on the ordinary person who is in need of accommodation. This would be the starting point for any comparison.

Wales 12.210

Once they have established the harm or detriment that the ordinary homeless person would experience and their ability to fend for themselves when street homeless, they will need to compare this to the applicant. If the applicant or any other person reasonably expected to reside would be less able to fend for themselves AND thus suffer more harm as result of the special reason (Mental Health, Substance misuse, etc.) then they would be considered “Vulnerable” as set out in section 70 (c) and (j).1

Homeless ‘as a result of an emergency’

12.207 This category1 corresponds precisely with HA 1996, s 189(1)(d) save that it has been extended to include those with whom the applicant resides or might reasonably be expected to reside2.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(d). See also Welsh Code, para 16.34.

Homeless as a result of domestic abuse

12.208 The questions for the local housing authority when dealing with an applicant, or a person with whom an applicant resides or might reasonably be expected to reside, who may fall within this category1 are:

• is he or she homeless;
• has he or she been subjected to domestic abuse; and
• if so, is the homelessness a result of the domestic abuse?

12.209 Unlike the equivalent category in the English Order1, there is no need for the applicant to be vulnerable as a result of having fled accommodation in order to qualify in this category.

12.210 Unlike the equivalent category in the English Order1, the requirement is for the person to be homeless. It is not necessary for the person to have physically ceased to occupy his or her accommodation. It will suffice that the accommodation is not reasonable for him or her to continue to occupy2. This enables an applicant to apply for accommodation and quickly be accepted as homeless, in priority need and unintentionally homeless, whilst still at home. He or she will therefore be able to receive the benefit of the H(W)A 2014, s 73 duty3 and the H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty4 thereafter, without necessarily having to be provided with interim accommodation first.

2 H(W)A 2014, s 55(3) and s 57. See further Chapter 10 for the definition of homelessness.
3 See 17.73–17.117.
12.210 Priority Need

4 See 17.146–17.197.

12.211 It will be noted that in contrast to the position under the English Order, the abuse must be domestic in nature. Domestic abuse has the meaning given in H(W)A 2014, s 58¹, that is, the extended definition adopted by the Supreme Court in *Yemshaw v Hounslow London Borough Council*²: ‘physical violence, threatening or intimidating behaviour and any other form of abuse which, directly or indirectly may give rise to the risk of harm’³.

A person aged 16 or 17

12.212 This category embraces all 16- and 17-year-olds¹ and those with whom they reside or might reasonably be expected to reside. In contrast to the situation under the English Priority Need Order², there are no exceptions to this category³. There is certainly no requirement that the applicant be vulnerable or separated from his or her parents. It is simply being aged 16 or 17 that gives rise to the priority need. Note, in contrast to the position for those who apply to local housing authorities in England for homelessness assistance, the requirement is that the person is aged 16 or 17 at the time of application, rather than the time of the initial decision or review. This point is emphasised in the Welsh Code which states that ‘it is important to note that a person who is 16 or 17 at the time they are applying to a Local Housing Authority for accommodation retains their priority need should they turn 18 at any point during the assessment’⁴. This avoids the problems discussed at 12.136–12.139, whereby delay on the part of a local housing authority might in certain circumstances, deprive an applicant of his or her rights.

² SI 2002/2051, art 3.
⁴ Welsh Code, para 16.40.

12.213 Despite the breadth of this category, the intention of the Welsh Government is that the primary responsibility for accommodating 16- and 17-year-olds, as is the case in England¹, should lie with children’s services². Specifically, 16- and 17-year-olds who are without accommodation will generally be accommodated under the Social Services and Well-being (Wales) Act 2014³. Joint working between local housing authorities is encouraged in order to achieve this⁴. In instances where the young person exercises their right to refuse assistance from children’s services then the local housing authority will owe him or her a duty under H(W)A 2014, ss 73 or 75⁵.

³ See 20.85–20.98.
Wales 12.218

A person aged 18, 19 or 20 at particular risk of exploitation

12.214 If an applicant, or a person with whom he or she resides or might reasonably be expected to reside:

• is aged 18 or over, but under 21; and
• is at particular risk of sexual or financial exploitation, then he or she will have a priority need.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(g). See also Welsh Code, paras 16.45–16.48.

12.215 Note that the person must be at ‘particular’ risk for the terms of H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(g) to be satisfied, not merely subject to the general risk of sexual or financial exploitation that any young person may face. Presumably this additional criterion will be satisfied by some personal characteristic of the person (eg drug or alcohol dependency), some special feature of his or her local area (eg prevalent street prostitution) or any aspect of his or her personal circumstances which places the applicant at a greater than normal level of risk. Although a young person need not have been exploited in the past in order to fall within this category, the Welsh Code emphasises that ‘where young persons have a history of being sexually or financially exploited, they should normally be regarded as vulnerable and in priority need’. However, the Code goes on to warn that ‘it is not good practice for Authorities to always expect evidence of sexual or financial exploitation’.

1 Welsh Code, para 16.48.
2 Welsh Code, para 16.48.

12.216 A person who is deemed to be at risk who turns 21 during the assessment process will still fall within this category.

1 Welsh Code, para 16.46.

A person aged 18, 19 or 20 who has been looked after, accommodated or fostered

12.217 If an applicant, or a person with whom he or she resides or might reasonably be expected to reside:

• is aged 18 or over, but under 21; and
• was ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’ at any time while under the age of 18, then he or she will have a priority need.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(h). See also Welsh Code, paras 16.49–16.56.

12.218 The definition of ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’ is given in H(W)A 2014, s 70(2) and is very broad. Although the shorthand commonly used for this rubric is ‘care leaver’, there is no requirement that the person has been in care. For example, the definition is met if the person has at some time in the past been ‘privately fostered’.

1 H(W)A 2014, s 70(2)(c).
12.219 Priority Need

12.219 There is no minimum period of time during which the person must have been looked after, accommodated or fostered in order to qualify\(^1\). Nor is there any specified age at which he or she must have been looked after, accommodated or fostered. Any young person (now aged 18, 19 or 20), who was ‘looked after, accommodated or fostered’ at any point in his or her life, for any period, will fall within this category.

\(^1\) Welsh Code, para 16.51. To have been ‘looked-after’ a child must have been accommodated continuously for a period of 24 hours or more: see Children Act 1989, s 22 and Social Services and Well-being Act 2014, s 74.

A person homeless after leaving the armed forces of the Crown

12.220 This category is met by any applicant, or a person with whom an applicant resides or might reasonably be expected to reside, who is a former member of the armed forces and\(^1\):

(1) is homeless; and

(2) has been homeless since leaving the armed forces.

\(^1\) H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(i). See also Welsh Code, paras 16.57–16.63.

12.221 Unlike the English equivalent category\(^1\), there is no requirement that the person be ‘vulnerable’, whether by reason of service in the forces or otherwise.

12.222 Only service in the ‘regular armed forces of the Crown’ satisfies the condition for this category. The definition of ‘armed forces’ used is set out in H(W)A 2014, s 99\(^1\). The length of time since discharge is not in point; the issue is whether the applicant has remained homeless since he or she was discharged. Though strictly the wording of H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(i) requires the applicant, or the person with whom the applicant resides or might reasonably be expected to reside, to have been homeless since the point of discharge, the Welsh Code has interpreted this as a more relaxed requirement that he or she should have ‘failed to secure suitable permanent accommodation’ since leaving the armed forces\(^2\). The Welsh Code advises that local housing authorities should recognise this criterion as being satisfied where the individual has been unable to secure either an assured (including assured shorthold), introductory or secure tenancy, or permanent accommodation with family or friends\(^3\).

\(^1\) Which refers to the regular forces as defined by the Armed Forces Act 2006, s 374.

\(^2\) Welsh Code, para 16.60.

\(^3\) Welsh Code, paras 16.60–16.61.

A former prisoner who is vulnerable

12.223 The questions for the local housing authority in dealing with an applicant, or a person with whom he or she resides or might reasonably be expected to reside, who may fall within this category are\(^1\):

(1) Is he or she vulnerable;

---
(2) If so, is the vulnerability as a result of having served a custodial sentence, having been committed or remanded in custody by court order, or having been remanded to youth detention accommodation under Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012, s 91(4);

(3) If so, does he or she have a local connection with the area of the local housing authority?

1 H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(j). See also Welsh Code, paras 16.64–16.70.

12.224 The term ‘custodial sentence’ is defined to include:

• a sentence of imprisonment for those aged 21 or over;
• a sentence of detention for those aged under 18;
• a sentence of detention for public protection for those under 18 who commit serious offences;
• a sentence of detention for those under 18 who commit certain violent or sexual offences;
• a sentence of custody for life for persons under 21;
• a sentence of detention in a young offender institution for those aged between 18 and 21; and
• a detention and training order.

Being committed to custody by an order of a court refers to punishment under the inherent jurisdiction of the court to commit and ‘to committals under the court’s statutory powers’.

1 Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 76; the references to sentence of custody for life and sentences of detention in a young offender institution are due to be repealed by the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, but no date for their repeal has yet been appointed (Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, s 80(1)).

2 Such as that at County Courts Act 1984, s 118.

12.225 Unlike the English Priority Need Order, the ambit of the phrase ‘remanded in . . . custody’ in H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(j) is left undefined. Youth detention accommodation is defined in H(W)A 2014, s 99 and includes a secure children’s home, a secure training centre and a young offender’s institution.

1 SI 2002/2051, art 5(1)(c).

12.226 The inclusion of a ‘local connection’ requirement, which has been reproduced from the Homeless Persons (Priority Need) (Wales) Order 2002, reflects a concern expressed during the passage of the Homelessness Act 2002 through Parliament, when MPs representing constituencies containing sizeable prisons were anxious that their local housing authorities should not suddenly receive a host of applications from former prisoners. The solution in England was to restrict the extension of priority need to those former prisoners who were ‘vulnerable’ as a result of their imprisonment. The solution in Wales was to require that former prisoners must have a local connection with the local housing authority to which they apply in order to obtain the benefit of this priority need category. As can be seen, the requirement for the person to be vulnerable, which was not a requirement under Homeless Persons (Priority Need) (Wales) Order 2002, has now been introduced in H(W)A 2014,
12.226 Priority Need

s 70(1)(j). The rationale behind this amendment was to ‘redress the balance of priority need status for vulnerable applicants by amending the priority need status of former prisoners’4, thereby bringing the position in Wales closer in-line with that in England.

12.227 Local connection to an area is defined at H(W)A 2014, s 811. A person has a local connection with the area of a local housing authority in circumstances where he or she has a connection with it because the person is, or in the past was, normally resident there, because the person is employed there, because of family associations, or because of special circumstances2. But local connection cannot be acquired by residence as a result of detention under the authority of an enactment in that area3. A former prisoner would, therefore, not acquire a local connection in the area where his or her prison was situated, unless he or she had acquired a local connection with that area for a reason other than residence, eg by employment (either before or after the period of imprisonment)4. Recognising the problems this may cause for ex-prisoners who wish to make a fresh start in a new area post-release, or those who cannot return home owing to licence conditions, the Welsh Code recommends that local housing authorities should consider having reciprocal arrangements with another area, whereby a former prisoner could be accommodated outside of the area to which he or she has applied as homeless5.

5 Welsh Code, para 16.68.

12.228 A prisoner who has no local connection with the local housing authority to which the application is made may of course still argue that he or she is vulnerable for another special reason within the meaning of H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(c), in which case the lack of local connection will not be a bar to establishing a priority need6.

INTRODUCTION

England

13.1 When a local housing authority in England has determined that an applicant is homeless and that she or he is eligible for assistance, the relief duty under Housing Act 1996 (HA 1996), s 189B(2) is owed to the applicant meaning that the local housing authority must take reasonable steps to help the applicant secure that suitable accommodation becomes available for his or her occupation. If the applicant is still homeless at the time this duty comes to an end, whether any further duty is owed (and if so, which one) will depend on whether the applicant has a priority need and whether she or he has become homeless intentionally.
13.1 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

1 Housing Act 1996, s 189B(2) as inserted by the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138–15.189.

2 See Chapter 13.

13.2 For the first 20 years of statutory homelessness provision in the UK (1977–1997), the decision as to whether or not the homelessness of a priority need applicant had come about ‘intentionally’ was pivotal. Those who had not become homeless intentionally were treated as entitled to a permanent home. Those who had become homeless intentionally would merely be given temporary accommodation and then only for a very short period. Disputes about whether an applicant had become homeless ‘intentionally’ accordingly dominated the work of housing advisers and homelessness officers, and formed the bulk of the reported court cases on the statutory provisions. To be found to have become ‘homeless intentionally’ was to be given what one judge described as the ‘mark of Cain’.

13.3 Much has changed since the early days of homelessness law. First, a decision of the House of Lords in 1996 exploded the myth that those applicants who had become homeless unintentionally were entitled to be provided with permanent homes under the statutory homelessness provisions. Second, the new statutory framework of HA 1996, Pt 7 as originally enacted made it clear that the highest duty owed to any applicant would be met by the provision of temporary accommodation only. Third, changes to the arrangements for allocation of social housing (made by the Homelessness Act 2002) required local housing authorities to give a preference to all homeless people, including those who have become homeless intentionally. Fourth, changes to HA 1996, Pt 7 (made by the Localism Act 2011) allowed local housing authorities to bring the main housing duty to an end by making them an offer of suitable private rented accommodation. So even applicants who are not found to have become homeless intentionally may have accommodation secured for them in the private rented sector. Fifth, the coming into force of the Homelessness Reduction Act 2017 (HRA 2017) has broadened the scope of the duties under HA 1996, Pt 7 with the effect that the HA 1996, s 195(2) prevention duty and the s 189B(2) relief duty are owed to all eligible applicants who are, respectively, threatened with homelessness or homeless, irrespective of whether the applicant became homeless (or threatened with homelessness) intentionally.

8 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138–15.189.
9 See Chapter 11.
10 In fact, the concept of ‘becoming threatened with homelessness intentionally’ has been abolished by HRA 2017, s 4(5) entirely (for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) which repealed HA 1996, s 196.

13.4 These factors have reduced the significance of a finding that an applicant has become homeless intentionally. However, the changes have certainly not rendered the question of ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ altogether academic. Statistically, the numbers affected are significant. And much still turns on whether homelessness was intentional. The English Code explains the policy reasoning behind the different duties owed to those applicants found to have become homeless intentionally and those found not to have become homeless intentionally:

‘This reflects the general expectation that, wherever possible, people should take responsibility for their own accommodation needs and ensure that they do not behave in a way which might lead to the loss of their accommodation’.

1 Table 770: Decisions taken by local authorities under the Housing Act 1996 on applications by eligible households (DCLG) shows that the number of decisions where the applicant had a priority need and had become homeless intentionally had been 3% of applications for homelessness assistance each year from 1998–2002. From 2003, the proportion started rising to a high of 9% for 2016–17. This 9% comprised 9,850 households. No figures are collected for those applicants found not to have a priority need and to have become homeless intentionally.
2 See 13.8–13.10.

13.5 However, even an adverse finding that homelessness has been brought about ‘intentionally’ is simply the result of one local housing authority having applied a complex statutory test and its own judgment to the facts of the application. Two equally reasonable local housing authorities may quite lawfully reach different conclusions on the same statutory test and the same set of facts. This means that there are often prospects for an applicant, who has been found to have become homeless intentionally by one local housing authority, to apply to another local housing authority and find that a different conclusion will be reached.

1 See 8.55–8.63.

13.6 Likewise, it is important to appreciate that the adverse finding is one that is applicable only so long as the period of homelessness lasts. A person who is found to have become homeless intentionally may render that finding irrelevant to any future incidence of homelessness by, for example, obtaining settled accommodation. This limited life of a finding of becoming homeless intentionally means that a fresh application can always be made to a local housing authority for assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7, unless the facts are precisely the same on the new application as upon the last application. Obviously, to save repeating what may have been extensive recent investigations on a previous application, the local housing authority is entitled initially to rely on its original finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally and to confine its inquiries to whether there has been any intervening settled accommodation or other factual change since the earlier finding\(^1\).

1 For ‘settled accommodation’ see 13.136–13.146. More generally, for the ways in which an applicant becoming homeless intentionally may be rendered irrelevant by subsequent events see 13.133–13.154.

3 See English Code, para 18.11.

13.7 There is no special provision dispensing with this question of whether an applicant has become homeless intentionally where he or she has made a fresh application for homelessness assistance to a local housing authority in England within two years of acceptance of a private rented sector offer\(^1\). Even though inquiry into priority need is dispensed with\(^2\), the HA 1996, s 193(2)\(^3\) main housing duty will only apply where the local housing authority is ‘not satisfied that the applicant became homeless intentionally’. Local housing authorities will therefore be permitted to examine the reasons why the applicant has lost his or her accommodation.

3 See 16.94–16.199.

13.8 An applicant who is homeless but is not found to have become homeless intentionally and who does have a priority need will, if he or she is still homeless at the time the HA 1996, s 189B(2)\(^1\) relief duty comes to an end, generally be owed the HA 1996, s 193(2)\(^2\) main housing duty. That duty requires the local housing authority to secure that accommodation is available for occupation by the applicant\(^3\). There are a number of exceptions to this general rule, which are discussed at 16.95\(^4\). Of particular significance is the exception at HA 1996, s 193(1A)(b)\(^5\). In circumstances where the HA 1996, s 189B(2)\(^6\) relief duty came to an end as a result of the applicant being given notice of his or her deliberate and unreasonable failure to cooperate\(^7\), he or she will be owed the HA 1996, s 193C(4)\(^8\) accommodation duty instead.

1 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138–15.189.

2 See 16.94–16.199.

4 In overview, the main housing duty will not be owed where the relief duty has come to an end in the circumstances set out in HA 1996, s 193(1A) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. That is, where the relief duty has come to end by reason of the applicant refusing a ‘final accommodation offer’ (defined by HA 1996, s 193A(4) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) or a ‘final Pt 6 offer’ (defined by HA 1996, s 193A(5) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) or where notice has been given under HA 1996 s 193B(2) (as inserted by HRA 2017, s 7(1) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018) that the applicant has deliberately and unreasonably refused to take any step recorded in his or her
Introduction 13.12

13.9 In contrast, an applicant who became homeless intentionally and who has a priority need will be owed lesser duties:\footnote{See English Code, paras 15.13–15.15.}

‘. . . . to secure that accommodation is available for his occupation for such period as they consider will give him a reasonable opportunity of securing accommodation\footnote{HA 1996, s 190(2)(a) as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(5) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. English Code, para 9.4. See 16.81–16.93.}.

‘. . . . provide him with (or secure that he is provided with) advice and assistance in any attempts he may make to secure that accommodation becomes available for his occupation\footnote{HA 1996, s 190(2)(b) as amended by HRA 2017, s 5(5) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. English Code, para 9.4. See 15.231.}.

\footnote{Considerations relevant to the exercise of this discretion will include the needs of the applicant and the risk of him or her sleeping rough. English Code, para 14.19.}

13.10 An applicant who does not have a priority need will be owed no further duty, irrespective of whether he or she became homeless intentionally. To mitigate the hardship caused to those falling within this class the English Code suggests that ‘the authority may want to consider continuing the relief duty for longer’.\footnote{See English Code, paras 15.13–15.15.}

13.11 Further discussion as to the extent of these various duties, and the methods of performing them, is provided at Chapter 16.

Wales

13.12 In Wales, under the Housing (Wales) Act 2014 (H(W)A 2014), Pt 2, the consequences of a finding that an applicant has become homeless intentionally are similar. Indeed, the amendments to HA 1996, Pt 7 introduced by HRA 2017\footnote{were modelled on H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, the stated aim of which was to ‘extend the help available’ to applicants for homelessness assistance in Wales ‘by improving services for those who are not in priority need and those who are found to be intentionally homeless’ and to ‘provide greater protection for children in households who are found to have caused their own homeless-} ness\(^1\).\

1. For applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

---

13.13 As is the case in England, all eligible applicants who are threatened with homelessness will be entitled to the prevention duty, irrespective of whether they have become threatened with homelessness intentionally\(^1\). Likewise, all eligible homeless applicants are entitled to the relief duty irrespective of whether they became homeless intentionally\(^2\).

13.14 The principal distinction between HA 1996, Pt 7\(^1\) and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 is that a local housing authority in Wales may choose to have regard to whether particular categories of person have become homeless intentionally\(^2\). The idea behind this approach is to put the onus on local housing authorities to ‘opt into having regard to intentionality rather than opt out’ with the intention that local housing authorities ‘will eventually move away from the use of intentionality’\(^3\). The procedure which a local housing authority must follow in order to ‘opt into’ having regard to whether a category of person became homeless intentionally is set out at 13.252–13.255.

1. As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

13.15 Whether or not such a decision is made is a matter of discretion for each local housing authority: a local housing authority is not obliged to make a decision to ‘have regard to intentionality’\(^1\). Where a local housing authority has made a decision to ‘opt into’ having regard to whether a category of person became homeless intentionally and has given appropriate notice of that decision, the local housing authority must consider whether every applicant falling within the relevant category has become homeless intentionally\(^2\). They may only cease doing so if a subsequent decision is taken to stop having regard to whether or not applicants falling into the category specified in the notice have become homeless intentionally\(^3\) and notice of that decision is then properly publicised\(^4\). If the local housing authority has decided to ‘have regard to intentionality’ in respect of a category of person to which the applicant belongs then, when the H(W)A 2014, s 73\(^1\) relief duty comes to an end, if the applicant is homeless\(^5\), eligible for help\(^7\), has a priority need\(^8\) and did not become homeless intentionally, the local housing authority must secure that suitable accommodation is available for his or her occupation\(^9\). Conversely, if the applicant did become homeless intentionally then the H(W)A 2015, s 75 duty will not arise, and no further duty will be owed\(^10\).

Introduction 13.18

H(W)A 2014, s 78(4). The principle behind this provision is that all applicants must be treated alike: there is no power to make an exception and overlook whether a particular applicant has become homeless intentionally.

5 See 17.73–17.117.

6 See CHAPTER 10.

7 See CHAPTER 11.

8 See CHAPTER 12.

9 H(W)A 2014, s 75(1) and (2). See 17.146–17.197.

10 H(W)A 2014, s 75(3) contains an exception to this rule, whereby certain categories of priority need applicant may be owed the duty under H(W)A 2014, s 75(1) even if they became homeless intentionally. However, this section is not yet in force. The Welsh Government intends to bring H(W)A 2014, s 75(3) into force in 2019; Welsh Code, para 14.10.

13.16 Where a local housing authority has not made a decision to ‘opt into’ having regard to whether the category of persons to which the applicant belongs became homeless intentionally, or has not given appropriate notice of that decision, then the local housing authority is not entitled to have regard to whether the applicant became homeless intentionally. In this situation, when the relief duty comes to an end, the local housing authority must secure that suitable accommodation is available for his or her occupation, providing that he or she is homeless, eligible for help, and has a priority need. Whether the applicant became homeless intentionally is irrelevant.

2 H(W)A 2014, s 73(1). See 17.73–17.117.

3 H(W)A 2014, s 75(1) and (2).

The structure of this chapter

13.17 In this chapter, first, we consider the test used by local housing authorities in England and Wales to determine whether or not someone has become homeless intentionally, and then outline some of the common scenarios in which an applicant may or may not be found to have become homeless intentionally. The test for determining whether a person has become homeless intentionally is identical under HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, and so applications to local housing authorities in England and Wales will be dealt with together.

3 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

13.18 We then go on to consider the rules unique to H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, governing the circumstances where a local housing authority is entitled to have regard to intentionality.

1 See 13.252–13.255.
13.19 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

MAKING INQUIRIES INTO ‘BECOMING HOMELESS INTENTIONALLY’

13.19 A local housing authority must conduct such inquiries into an application as will enable it to determine what duty under HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 (if any) is owed. But this will not necessarily require a local housing authority to consider whether the applicant has become homeless intentionally in every case.

1. HA 1996, s 184(1)(b); H(W)A 2014, s 62(5).

13.20 For applications made to local housing authorities in England, or for applications made to local housing authorities in Wales where the local housing authority has made a decision to have regard to whether an applicant has become homeless intentionally, whether the applicant has become homeless intentionally is not relevant in deciding whether the applicant is entitled to the prevention duty or the relief duty. The issue becomes relevant at the later stage where the relief duty is coming to an end and it falls to the local housing authority to determine what further duty, if any, is owed. An applicant who does not have a priority need will be owed no further duty. Whereas an applicant who does have a priority need will be ‘owed a lesser duty if they have become homeless intentionally than would be owed to them if they were homeless unintentionally’.

2. HA 1996, s 195(2) as amended by HRA 2017, s 4(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, s 66(1). See 15.138–15.189 and 17.73–17.117.
3. Note that for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018 and for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018, the assessment of the circumstances that caused him or her to become homeless or threatened with homelessness. See HA 1996, s 189A(2)(a). In practice this assessment is likely to overlap to some extent with the inquiries necessary to determine whether the applicant became homeless intentionally even if it does not bear on the performance of the prevention or relief duties. See English Code, para 11.8.
4. See Welsh Code, para 17.37. See 16.81–16.216 and 17.146–17.197 for the duties that may be owed by local housing authorities in England and Wales respectively, when the relief duty comes to an end.
5. As such, where a local housing authority has decided that an applicant does not have a priority need it need not necessarily make further inquiries to determine whether the applicant became homeless intentionally.

13.21 The Codes provide differing advice as to precisely when a local housing authority should carry out its inquiries to determine whether an applicant became homeless intentionally. The English Code encourages local housing authorities to conclude their inquiries into whether the applicant became homeless intentionally, while the the HA 1996, s 189B(2) relief duty is being performed. The rationale appears to be that an applicant who has been forewarned of the fact that he or she has become homeless intentionally and will not be owed a long-term accommodation duty may be more diligent in his or her efforts to find accommodation:
Inquiries into ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ 13.24

‘Housing authorities may issue a section 184 decision to the applicant, that when the relief duty ends they will owe them a duty under section 190 because they have a priority need but are intentionally homeless. Although the section 190 duty cannot commence until the relief duty has come to an end, the authority may wish to alert an applicant that the main housing duty will not be owed. It may be beneficial to review the personalised housing plan at this point to help maximise joint efforts to relieve homelessness.’

1 As inserted by HRA 2017, s 5(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018. See 15.138–15.189.
2 English Code, para 13.11.

13.22 In contrast, the Welsh Code advises that until the local housing authority is required to determine whether the applicant became homeless intentionally, it should not spend time investigating the issue ‘to the detriment of focussing on problem solving through the use of reasonable steps to help the applicant to prevent homelessness or to help secure accommodation’. However, the Welsh Code acknowledges that ‘the Act does not say that a Local Housing Authority is not allowed to look at intentionality at any point during its assessment’ and suggests that if it becomes clear at an early stage that an applicant might later be found to have become homeless intentionally, then he or she should be notified by letter that the local housing authority is minded to find him or her intentionally homeless, and given the opportunity to provide any further explanation or evidence. This latter approach is closer to that which is recommended by the English Code.

1 Welsh Code, para 17.36.
2 Welsh Code, para 17.35.

13.23 For applications made to local housing authorities in Wales, where the local housing authority has not made a decision to have regard to whether an applicant has become homeless intentionally inquiries into whether the applicant became homeless intentionally may legitimately be dispensed with since it will have no bearing on the outcome of the application.

2 Welsh Code, para 17.34.

13.24 Obviously, an individual and applicant-centred approach to the question is required in both England and Wales. Local housing authorities should not adopt general policies which seek to predetermine that particular classes of applicant (eg tenants of the local housing authority who were evicted for arrears of rent or anti-social behaviour) will or will not be found to have become homeless intentionally. Local housing authorities should make all necessary inquiries about each particular application and reach a decision in the light of those inquiries. When dealing with applications for homelessness assistance from care leavers, the English Code advises that local housing authorities should make inquiries of the relevant children’s services authority and obtain advice and assistance as to the young person’s emotional and mental well-being, maturity and general ability to understand the impact of his or her actions. If there is doubt about the matter at the conclusion of initial inquiries, then either inquiries should continue until the matter is free of doubt, or the benefit of the doubt should be given to the applicant and he or she should be found not to have become homeless intentionally. Where the events which the local housing authority is inquiring into occurred some years earlier and the facts are unclear, it may not be possible for the local housing authority to satisfy itself that the applicant became homeless intentionally.
13.24 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

1. English Code, para 9.6; Welsh Code, para 17.12.
2. English Code, para 22.17.

13.25 Any decision that an applicant has become homeless intentionally should be accompanied by clear reasons for that finding, even though the formal decision being notified to the applicant is only the decision as to what precise HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 duty the applicant is owed.

1. As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2. English Code, para 18.33; Welsh Code, para 10.56; and Southall v West Wiltshire District Council (2002) October Legal Action, p 31, Swindon County Court.

13.26 The burden of making the inquiries rests with the local housing authority. It is not for the applicant to prove his or her case, and satisfy the local housing authority that she or he did not become homeless intentionally. This was reinforced by the Court of Appeal in O’Connor v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council, where it was held that a local housing authority, when considering the question of whether the applicant had become homeless intentionally, should consider whether the applicant had been unaware of a relevant fact in good faith, regardless of whether this latter point had been raised by the applicant. A later Court of Appeal decision refined the point, adding that the decision-maker need not consider matters that were not raised by the applicant, unless those matters were within ‘the circumstances of obviousness’.

2. Aw-Aden v Birmingham City Council [2005] EWCA Civ 1834, [2006] July Legal Action, p 29, CA per Maurice Kay LJ at [12]. See Bury Metropolitan Borough Council v Gibbons [2010] EWCA Civ 327, [2010] HLR 33, CA, where one of the reasons why the review decision was held to be unlawful was that the decision-maker had failed to consider whether, on the facts, the applicant had been, in good faith, unaware of relevant facts, namely the availability of housing benefit and his right to remain in possession until a possession order had been made.

13.27 The English Code suggests that there is one exception to the general rule about the burden of proof: if an applicant is seeking to establish that he or she did not acquiesce in the deliberate actions of another member of his her household (who has already been found, or is likely to be found, to have caused the homelessness of the household), acquiescence may be assumed in the absence of material which indicates to the contrary. This reflects the approach advocated by the courts: where there is any material that indicates that the applicant may not have acquiesced, the local housing authority must make inquiries in the usual way. The Welsh Code puts matters more simply, stating that the local housing authority ‘must satisfy itself that the applicant acquiesced in the behaviour that led to the homelessness in order to find them...

intentionally homeless. 3

1 English Code, para 9.5. This marks a departure from (or at least a clarification of) the previous edition of the English Code which had suggested, at para 11.5, that that applicant would 'need to demonstrate that he or she was not involved in the acts or omissions that led to homelessness, and did not have control over them.'

3 Welsh Code, para 17.13.

13.28 If, during its inquiries, a local housing authority in England has reason to believe that an applicant whose household includes children under 18 might be found to have become homeless intentionally, it is under a duty to ask the applicant to give consent for his or her circumstances to be referred to the children’s services authority, and then (if consent is given) to make that referral.1 For local housing authorities in Wales, the equivalent duty arises where the household includes children under 18 and the local housing authority has reason to believe that the H(W)A 2014, s 75 duty is not likely to apply to the applicant.2 This will enable children’s services to begin planning what assistance it might provide for the household if the local housing authority’s final conclusion is that the applicant did become homeless intentionally. In both England and Wales, the local housing authority is obliged to follow up the referral by advising the children’s services authority of the decision that it actually reaches on the application for homelessness assistance.3

THE STATUTORY MEANING

Overview

13.29 In the homelessness provisions of HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, the word “intentionally” is not given its ordinary or dictionary meaning. It has a very tightly prescribed statutory meaning. Most obviously this is because, in the ordinary use of language, an applicant’s homelessness is very often brought about, not by an intentional act of the applicant, but rather by the intentional act of another party (such as a landlord, parent or court bailiff) who has deliberately ejected the applicant. Moreover, it is something of a contradiction to suggest that an applicant has become homeless intentionally, since the whole point of the applicant making an application for homelessness assistance is to avoid or end his or her state of homelessness.

13.30 As Lord Denning MR observed, in one of the earliest homelessness cases:
13.30 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

‘Many people would have thought that [the applicant’s] conduct, however deplorable, was not ‘deliberate’ in the sense required by . . . [the Act]. She did not deliberately do anything to get herself turned out.’

13.31 Similarly, Lord Lowry said:

‘No one really becomes homeless or threatened with homelessness intentionally; the word is a convenient label to describe the result of acting or failing to act as described in [the Act]’

1 Din v Wandsworth London Borough Council [1983] 1 AC 657, HL at 679, referring to Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, s 17, containing the same definition of ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ as in HA 1996, s 191(1).

13.32 The statutory definition of ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ under HA 1996, s 191, is that:

‘. . . a person becomes homeless intentionally if he deliberately does or fails to do anything in consequence of which he ceases to occupy accommodation which is available for his occupation and which it would have been reasonable for him to continue to occupy.’

1 HA 1996, s 191(1).

13.33 Similarly, by virtue of H(W)A 2014, s 77(1) and 77(2) a person is homeless intentionally if:

‘. . . the person deliberately does or fails to do anything in consequence of which the person ceases to occupy accommodation which is available for the person’s occupation and which it would have been reasonable for the person to continue to occupy.’

1 H(W)A 2014, s 77(2).

13.34 This complex composite definition has been described as part of a statutory ‘semantic nightmare’.

1 Roughead v Falkirk District Council 1979 SCOLAG 188 per Sheriff Sinclair.

13.35 Because each and every element of the composite must be in place before a local housing authority can be satisfied that an applicant ‘became homeless intentionally’, initial expectations (when the phrase was first enacted) were that it would only be satisfied infrequently. The first edition of the Code of Guidance in 1978 indicated that the number of applicants falling foul of it was ‘expected to be small’.

13.36 The statutory formulation is most practically approached by treating it as having six elements. To ensure that they are all in place, the local housing authority needs to address six questions in the course of its inquiries and decision-making. The necessary premise for the questions is that the applicant is currently homeless (ignoring, of course, any interim accommodation that the local housing authority may have provided):

(1) Was there a deliberate act or omission (which does not include an act or omission in good faith by a person unaware of a material fact)?

(2) Was that a deliberate act or omission by the applicant?

(3) Was it as a consequence of that deliberate act or omission that the applicant ceased to occupy accommodation?

(4) Is the deliberate act (or omission), and the cessation of occupation it caused, an operative cause of the present homelessness?

(5) Was that accommodation available for the applicant's occupation and for occupation by members of the applicant’s family who normally resided with the applicant and by persons with whom the applicant might reasonably have been expected to reside?

(6) Would it have been reasonable for the applicant to have continued to occupy the accommodation?

1 See 13.42–13.94.

13.37 The fourth question, strictly, is not a part of the statutory formulation contained in HA 1996, s 191(1) and H(W)A 2014, s 77(2). However, adopting the approach set down by the Supreme Court in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council it is necessary to ask this additional question to determine whether or not an applicant is owed the main housing duty under HA 1996, s 193(2) or the duty to secure accommodation pursuant to H(W)A 2015, s 75(1).

2 See 16.94–16.199.
3 See 17.146–17.197.

13.38 If the local housing authority’s answer to each of these six questions is ‘Yes’, then the applicant will have ‘become homeless intentionally’. If the answer to any of them is ‘No’, the applicant cannot, at the time of application or review, be regarded as having become homeless intentionally.

13.39 There is, in addition, a category of applicants who are deemed to have become homeless intentionally if their application is made to a local housing authority in England, and who are intentionally homeless if their application is to a local housing authority in Wales. In these circumstances the six-question approach is not to be applied. An applicant ‘is’ intentionally homeless (Wales) or is ‘treated as’ becoming homeless intentionally (England) if:

(1) he or she has (in the past) entered into an arrangement to give up accommodation;
(2) it was accommodation which it would have been reasonable to continue to occupy;
(3) the purpose of the arrangement was to trigger entitlement to help under HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2; and
13.39 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

(4) there is no other good reason why the applicant is homeless.

1 In this instance the use of the deeming provision for applications in England is a semantic difference only.
2 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
3 HA 1996, s 191(3); H(W)A 2014, s 77(1) and (4). See also English Code, paras 9.8 and 13.40 This provision is obviously designed to prevent collusive arrangements, but in practice is hardly ever used. Not only are the conditions tightly drawn, but they only deem (England) or define (Wales) the ‘person’ who ‘enters into’ the arrangement as having become homeless intentionally. Its effect can therefore be avoided by a different member of the homeless household making the application for homelessness assistance.

1 HA 1996, s 191(3)(a); H(W)A 2014, s 77(4).
2 Discussed further at 13.95.

13.41 The following paragraphs address, in turn, each of the six elements of the composite statutory definition of ‘becoming homeless intentionally’.

Was there a deliberate act or omission?

A deliberate act or omission

13.42 The first step in the statutory definition is that the applicant ‘deliberately does or fails to do anything’ which results in his or her loss of accommodation. There is no definition of ‘deliberate act’ or ‘deliberate and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, stipulate that some acts or omissions are not to be treated as deliberate, by providing that:

‘. . . an act or omission in good faith on the part of a person who was unaware of any relevant fact shall not be treated as deliberate.’

1 HA 1996, s 191(1); H(W)A 2014, s 77(2).
2 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
3 The dictionary definition of ‘deliberate’ is ‘intentional’, which, in the context of HA 1996, s 191 and H(W)A 2014, s 77, seems to take one round in circles (Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, 2007).
4 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
5 HA 1996, s 191(2); H(W)A 2014, s 77(3).

13.43 So the word ‘deliberate’ in this setting must connotate a free election to act (or fail to act) in a particular way by a person in possession of all the relevant facts. As one English judge has put it:

‘I am satisfied from a consideration of the whole of the section . . . that “deliberately” is used in the ordinary sense of the word and is not to be narrowly construed. In particular the provisions of [the] subsection . . . indicate that “deliberately” means “after a consideration of all the relevant facts”.

1 Devenport v Salford City Council (1983) 8 HLR 54, CA per Waller LJ.

13.44 The most obvious example of an act ‘deliberately’ done arises where an applicant has surrendered, or given notice on, his or her tenancy, or sold his or her house, and made no provision for future accommodation. The most obvious example of a ‘deliberate’ omission would be failure to pay housing costs notwithstanding having the means and opportunity to pay them.

1 See Dyson v Kerrier District Council [1980] 1 WLR 1205, CA (a case in which the applicant gave up long-term accommodation for a precarious winter let); and F v Birmingham City Council [2006] EWC Civ 1427, [2007] HLR 18, CA, where a tenant gave up her secure tenancy for unaffordable private rented accommodation.

13.45 The English Code of Guidance introduces the notions of ‘force’ and ‘fault’:

‘An act or omission should not generally be treated as deliberate, even where deliberately carried out, if it was forced upon the applicant through no fault of their own.’

1 English Code, para 9.16; there is no equivalent in the Welsh Code.

13.46 Adopting the approach in this guidance and adding a non-statutory gloss to HA 1996, Pt 7 itself, a non-deliberate act could therefore occur either when:

(1) someone was forced to do something; or
(2) someone may have chosen to act in a particular way, but did so in ignorance of all the relevant facts.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 The important question of an applicant’s mental capacity at the time of the act or omission in this context is discussed at 13.66–13.75.

13.47 An example of the former would arise where the applicant had deliberately vacated accommodation, but did so because remaining there would lead to him or her experiencing further violence from a neighbour. Similarly, an applicant’s choice to spend his or her last available money to buy food for hungry children rather than paying the rent is not, for the purposes of the legislation, ‘deliberate’. On the latter set of facts, a local housing authority argued:

‘a person does or fails to do something “deliberately” if he makes a considered choice between two courses of action or inaction, either of which he is able to take. Thus, if he makes a considered decision to apply the only money he has in his pocket in maintaining his children instead of paying it to his landlord, he deliberately fails to pay the rent.’

1 As happened in R v Wandsworth London Borough Council ex p Hawthorne (1995) 27 HLR 59, CA. See also Adekunle v Islington London Borough Council (2009) November Legal Action, p 25, Mayor’s and City of London County Court, where the local housing authority had decided that the applicant’s choice to sell her house in the face of serious financial difficulties was ‘a conscious and deliberate decision’ which fell within the definition of ‘deliberate act’. The judge said that view was ‘mistaken and wrong’ in the circumstances where a person’s conscious decision is taken ‘in a situation where there is no realistic alternative’.

13.48 This submission was rejected. The Court of Appeal said:

‘The purpose of . . . the . . . Act is to house the homeless. Admittedly it is no part of that purpose to house those whose homelessness has been brought upon them by their own fault. But equally it is no part of it to refuse housing to those whose homelessness has been brought upon them without fault on their part, for example by disability, sickness, poverty or even a simple inability to make ends meet’.

Unaware of a relevant fact

13.49 The proviso dealing with ignorance of material facts can be difficult to operate in practice. First, the local housing authority must identify whether the fact of which the applicant was ignorant was ‘relevant’. Second, assuming that there was ignorance of a relevant fact, it must ask whether the applicant acted ‘in good faith’.

HA 1996, s 191(2); H(W)A 2014, s 77(3).

13.50 As one judge has observed, the proviso is:

‘. . . not without its difficulties. It is to be noted that the test is not the reasonableness of the applicant’s actions, but whether they were taken in ignorance. This may seem unjust. A person who takes the trouble to find out all the relevant facts, but makes a reasonable but mistaken judgment, cannot apparently claim the benefit of the section; a person who makes no enquiries at all and therefore acts in ignorance, may be able to do so. The omission of a test of reasonableness has been criticised in the courts (see for example R v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council ex p Rouf) but the section remains unamended’.

13.51 In using the words ‘any relevant fact’, Parliament has indicated that it intended a wide construction to be given to that phrase. But ‘relevant’ to what? In R v Westminster City Council ex p N-Dormadingar, the court explained that a fact is relevant where, had the applicant been aware of it, he or she would have taken it into account in deciding whether to give up the accommodation. The court also observed that the fact must be sufficiently clear and definite for its existence to be objectively determined. But this may be easier said than done. A person may have deliberately given up his or her existing home in the mistaken belief that there would be accommodation (or employment capable of funding accommodation) in a place to which he or she then moved. If that person was factually wrong about the availability of other accommodation (or employment) can that render the giving up of the original home not a ‘deliberate’ act?

13.52 For example, in one case, a young woman gave up her home overseas to come to the UK in the mistaken belief that her family would accommodate her here. In another, a businessman gave up his home in the UK to move abroad in the mistaken belief that he would be pursuing a sound business venture overseas capable of financing alternative accommodation there. Both were ignorant of the true facts, but were these facts ‘relevant’ to the giving up of their homes? In both cases, the judges decided that they were ‘relevant facts’ that were capable of triggering the application of the proviso to what was otherwise manifestly the deliberate giving-up of their homes.

13.53 Building on this, the courts have subsequently drawn a distinction between ‘matters of hope’ in relation to the prospects of future housing or employment, and relevant facts. In the case of a scientist who gave up accommodation in Belgium to come to the UK, the Court of Appeal described his prospects of finding suitable employment as resting on ‘little more than a wing and a prayer.’ The question of good faith simply did not arise, because the scientist’s over-optimism did not constitute a relevant fact. Similarly, in another case, the failure to see that withholding a small part of the rent to fund a replacement washing machine would lead to the non-renewal of the tenancy, did not amount to ignorance of a relevant fact. Longmore LJ commented that HA 1996, s 191(2) was intended to deal with a ‘genuine mistake or misapprehension of existing fact not with future events which may or may not occur’ and while a mistaken belief might suffice, ‘the belief has to be a belief in an existing fact, not a misplaced belief in the likelihood of the happening or otherwise of future event.’ Endorsing this approach, in the case of da Trindade v Hackney London Borough Council, Sales LJ explained that:

‘... an applicant who seeks to bring herself within section 191(2) where the future has not worked out as expected by her, has to show that at the time of her action or omission to act referred to in section 191(1), she had an active belief that a specific state of affairs would arise or continue in the future based on a genuine investigation about those prospects, and not on mere aspiration. Her belief about her current prospects regarding the future can then properly be regarded as belief about a current relevant fact (the apparent good prospects that the future will work out as she expects), such that if that belief can be seen to be unjustified by what a fully informed appreciation of her prospects at the time would have revealed, her mistake will qualify as unawareness of a relevant fact for the purposes of section 191(2).’

13.53 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

3 Similarly, in F v Birmingham City Council [2006] EWCA Civ 1427, [2007] HLR 18, CA, where a young woman had 'closed her eyes to the obvious', in that case that housing benefit would not be available for the whole of the contractual rent, there was no relevant fact and thus the issue of whether she had acted in good faith did not arise for consideration.

4 Enfield London Borough Council v Najim [2015] EWCA Civ 319, [2015] HLR 19, CA. Permission to appeal was refused by the Supreme Court on 27 July 2015 with the observations that 'the issue turned mainly on the factual evaluation made by the reviewing officer and the Court of Appeal was plainly right about section 191(2).

7 [2017] EWCA Civ 942, [2017] HLR 37, CA.

13.54 Note that what the individual has been ignorant of must have been a ‘fact’, and not the legal consequences of that fact. For example, an applicant who decides not to pay his or her housing costs, in the mistaken belief that this (and the consequent eviction) will not prejudice any subsequent application for homelessness assistance, has not acted in ignorance of any fact but rather in ignorance of the legal consequences of the deliberate omission to pay³. A secure tenant who leaves her home in fear of threats of violence cannot be said to have been unaware of the ‘fact’ that her security of tenure would be lost in her absence. That is not a fact but ‘a legal result of the factual departure which she made⁴. Likewise, it has been suggested that ignorance of legal rights is not ignorance of a ‘fact’⁵. The Codes contain some confusing advice regarding the scenario of a former tenant who left his or her home in response to a valid notice from the landlord where the former tenant was genuinely unaware that he or she had a legal right to remain until a possession order is made (and even until execution of the subsequent warrant). This scenario is described as ‘a general example of an act made in good faith’ even though the tenant had ‘the belief that they had no legal right to continue to occupy the accommodation’, which suggests an ignorance of the legal position⁶. More obviously, if, as a matter of fact, an applicant had to do something by a particular date to retain his or her home and did not understand that there was such a deadline, the applicant’s failure to act will not have been deliberate, as it was in ignorance of a relevant ‘fact’⁷.

1 R v Eastleigh Borough Council ex p Beattie (No 2) (1984) 17 HLR 168, QBD.

2 R v Croydon London Borough Council ex p Tobi (1987) 20 HLR 576, CA per O’Connor LJ at 582.

3 Brown v Hamilton District Council 1983 SLT 397 per Lord Fraser and R v Harrow London Borough Council ex p Wemgold (unreported) 24 August 1992, QBD.

4 English Code, para 9.24; Welsh Code, para 17.25. See also 13.62 for two other examples which appear at first sight to relate to ignorance of the law, but where the Codes advise that they might also be ignorance of a material fact.

5 R v Christchurch Borough Council ex p Conway (1987) 19 HLR 238, QBD. In Abdullahi v Brent London Borough Council [2007] EWCA Civ 885, (2007) October Legal Action, p 26, CA, a woman’s ignorance of her responsibility to pay the shortfall between her contractual rent and housing benefit was held to be a relevant fact and the issue of whether she had acted in good faith should have been considered by the local housing authority.

13.55 Another scenario considered by the courts is where an applicant approaches a local housing authority for help with his or her housing situation and is either given the wrong advice, or not given any advice at all. In both *Ugugbe v Southwark London Borough Council*¹ and Bury Metropolitan Borough Council v Gibbons, assured shorthold tenants who had been given notices requiring possession by their landlords approached their local housing authorities. Neither of them were given advice that they were entitled to remain in their properties until a possession order had been made against them. They each left their accommodation upon the expiration of the notice. On their subsequent applications for homelessness assistance, they were found to have become homeless intentionally. The Court of Appeal found in each case that the local housing authorities’ failure to give the correct advice had meant that they had not been acting ‘deliberately’, within the meaning of the statutory provisions, when they left their tenancies.

Good faith

13.56 ‘Good faith’ is a phrase introducing similar complexity¹. HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, couple lack of awareness and ‘good faith’. The test on lack of awareness is subjective: ‘was the applicant unaware of any relevant fact?’ rather than ‘would a reasonable person have been unaware of that fact?’ Then, if there was lack of awareness, the applicant must additionally have acted in ‘good faith’ for the act not to be considered ‘deliberate’ for the purposes of the definition of becoming homelessness intentionally.

² As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
³ O’Connor v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council [2004] EWCA Civ 394, [2004] HLR 37, CA per Sedley LJ at [30] and [34].

13.57 A mistake of judgment may constitute an act in good faith, but not those instances based on ‘wilful ignorance’¹ nor those based on ‘mere aspiration’². As the Court of Appeal put it in one case:

‘... the statutory dividing line ... comes not at the point where the applicant’s ignorance of a relevant fact was due to his own unreasonable conduct, but at the point where, for example, by shutting his eyes to the obvious he can be said not to have acted in good faith.’

² R v Westminster City Council ex p Obeid (1996) 29 HLR 389, QBD per Carnwath J at 397;

13.58 There is a degree of overlap in the circumstances in which a belief as to future prospects will constitute a ‘relevant fact’¹ and those in which an applicant will be found to have acted in ‘good faith’. An applicant who has carried out a genuine investigation of his or her future prospects is likely to have acted in good faith, even if the future does not turn out as planned².

¹ See 13.49–13.55.
13.58 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

13.59 If there is dishonesty, the act or omission cannot have been made in good faith. Lloyd LJ has said in the Court of Appeal:

‘the use of the phrase “good faith” carries a connotation of some kind of impropriety, or some element of misuse or abuse of the legislation. It is aimed at protecting local housing authorities from finding that they owe the full duty under Pt 7 of the 1996 Act to a person who, despite some relevant ignorance, ought to be regarded as intentionally homeless . . . Dishonesty is the most obvious kind of conduct which it would catch, and wilful blindness in the Nelsonian sense comes close to that’.

13.60 ‘Foolish or imprudent’ or unreasonable behaviour is not sufficient to put a person into the category of not acting in good faith. Conversely, a ‘laudable or understandable motive’ on the part of the applicant will not be sufficient to establish that he or she acted in good faith.

2 da Trindade v Hackney London Borough Council [2017] EWCA Civ 942, [2017] HLR 37, CA at [34] per Sales LJ.

13.61 Both Codes give examples of acts or omissions that could be made in good faith:

1 a person accrues rent arrears, unaware that he or she may be entitled to housing benefit or other social security benefits;
2 an owner-occupier, faced with foreclosure or possession proceedings to which there is no defence, sells or surrenders the property before a possession order is obtained; and
3 a tenant faced with possession proceedings to which there is no defence surrenders the property to the landlord.

13.62 The latter two examples could be analysed as ignorance of the legal right to remain in the property. In relation to the last example, the Welsh Code advises that the ignorance might be of ‘the general pressure on the authority for housing’ – a matter of fact rather than law’.

1 Welsh Code, para 17.26(iii). See further English Code, para 9.27.

13.63 Note that the adverb ‘deliberately’ governs only the act or omission itself, not the outcome, or consequences, of the act or omission. The question is not: ‘Has the applicant deliberately become homeless?’ but rather: ‘Has the applicant deliberately done something, or failed to do something, as a result of which he or she is now homeless?"

1 Devenport v Salford City Council (1983) 8 HLR 54, CA.

13.64 Whilst each case must be considered on its own facts, the Codes and the courts have considered a number of different scenarios that provide some useful guidance. Each is examined below.

Acts or omissions not generally considered ‘deliberate’

13.65 The Codes of Guidance suggest several circumstances in which acts or omissions of applicants ‘should not’ be considered to be ‘deliberate’.

1 English Code, para 9.17; Welsh Code, para 17.17.

(1) INCAPACITY

13.66 The Codes advise that where the local housing authority has reason to believe that an applicant was incapable of managing his or her affairs, for example by reason of age, mental illness or disability, his or her act or failure to act at that time should not be considered to have been ‘deliberate’. The formulations in the Codes suggest that both the very old and the very young might be considered incapable as a result of their age. Applying this approach, if the applicant was incapable at the date when the act or omission was committed, he or she will not have become homeless intentionally.

1 English Code, para 9.17(b); Welsh Code, para 17.17(ii).
2 Earlier editions of the Codes referred to ‘old age’ rather than ‘age’.

13.67 This guidance in the Codes should not be taken as meaning that young people and children cannot be found to have become homeless intentionally even when their deliberate acts were committed when they were children. In Denton v Southwark London Borough Council, the Court of Appeal upheld a finding by the local housing authority that a young person had become homeless intentionally as a result of his deliberate actions when he was 21. Similarly White v Southwark London Borough Council, a Court of Appeal judge said that actions of children as young as 13 might be ‘deliberate acts’.

However, the statutory guidance Prevention of homelessness and provision of accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless and/or require accommodation emphasises that ‘Housing authorities will need to be mindful that a homeless 16–17 year old might not have the ability to understand the full consequences of their actions and choices that would be expected of an adult’.

3 Sir Peter Gibson, dismissing an application for permission to bring a second appeal. Note that guidance from both the UK Government (Prevention of homelessness and provision of accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless and/or require accommodation) and the Welsh Government (Social Services and Well-being (Wales) Act 2014 Pt 6 Code of Practice (Looked After and Accommodated Children), each advise that young people who have refused accommodation provided by children’s services and who have lost such accommodation as a result should not be treated as having acted deliberately (English Guidance, para 4.21; Welsh Guidance, para 587).

1 April 2018, MHCLG and DfE. HA 1996, s 182 requires that local housing authorities take the guidance into account when exercising their HA 1996 Pt 7 functions. Similarly, the Local Authority Social Services Act 1970, s 7 requires children’s services’ departments to take the guidance into account when exercising children’s services’ functions.

5 Prevention of homelessness and provision of accommodation for 16 and 17 year old young people who may be homeless and/or require accommodation, para 4.20.

13.68 On the other hand however, the English Code advises that ‘all attempts should be made by housing authorities to avoid the impact of intentionally homeless decisions in relation to care leavers aged 18–25’.

To this end, local housing authorities should consult with the relevant children’s services authority and obtain advice and assistance as to the young person’s emotional and mental well-being, maturity and general ability to understand the impact of his or her actions.

1 English Code, para 22.17.
2 English Code, para 22.17.

13.69 Both the English and Welsh Codes were published many years after the principles and structured approach to determining capacity contained in the Mental Capacity Act 2005 (MCA 2005), ss 1–3 came into force. It is therefore surprising that neither Code makes any reference to the MCA 2005. The modern approach to capacity, set out in MCA 2005, ss 1–3, is that ‘a person must be assumed to have capacity unless it is established that he lacks capacity’.

When deciding whether or not a person has capacity to make a decision, the test is issue-specific. In other words the question is whether the person has or had the capacity to make that particular decision, not whether he or she can make other (simpler or more complex) decisions. An impairment or disturbance in the functioning of the mind or brain, which leads to the person being incapable of making a decision, may be permanent or temporary.

This very structured, careful approach should be applied by a local housing authority decision-maker considering whether or not an applicant for homelessness assistance had capacity at the date of commission of his or her deliberate act (or his or her omission to act).

2 MCA 2005, s 3.
3 MCA 2005, s 2.

13.70 Local housing authorities should also bear in mind their public sector equality duty in the Equality Act 2010, s 149. Local housing authorities should be making inquiries into the issue of capacity if there is any feature of the evidence presented to them that raises a real possibility that the applicant was disabled where that is relevant to the issue of whether he or she acted deliberately.

1 See 4.206–4.230 and 12.100.
13.71 Even if the applicant appears (at the date of his or her application) to be capable, he or she may have been temporarily incapable at the date that he or she committed the act or at the date when he or she omitted to act.

13.72 Although the phrasing in the Codes appears to reflect part of the priority need test for ‘vulnerability’\(^1\), it does not follow, just because an applicant has been found to be vulnerable (and therefore to have a priority need) at the date of the application for homelessness assistance, that he or she was incapable at the time when the accommodation was lost\(^2\).

\(^1\) HA 1996, s 189(1)(c); H(W)A 2014, s 70(1)(c); see 12.76–12.125 and 12.202–12.206.

(2) Limited capacity, frailty or vulnerability

13.73 Even if the applicant is generally capable of managing his or her own affairs and had a measure of capacity at the relevant time, the English Code advises local housing authorities to consider whether the particular act or omission leading to the loss of accommodation was ‘the result of limited mental capacity; or a temporary aberration or aberrations caused by mental illness or frailty’\(^1\).

\(^1\) English Code, para 9.17(c); Hijazi v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council [2003] EWCA Civ 692, [2003] HLR 72, CA.

13.74 The English Code advises that a temporary aberration or aberrations may have been caused by an assessed substance abuse problem and that, in those circumstances, an act or omission should not be considered as deliberate\(^1\).

\(^1\) See Kendall v City of Westminster Council (2009) November Legal Action, p 25, Central London County Court. It is not clear what the English Code means by ‘assessed’ and whether there has to have been some formal process of assessment.

13.75 The Welsh Code deals with these various issues under the heading of ‘vulnerability’\(^1\). The Code perhaps goes too far in suggesting that this means vulnerability within the meaning of H(W)A 2014, s 71\(^2\). It advises that local housing authorities might consider what advice and support was made available to someone who could be considered to be vulnerable before he or she became homeless. If advice and support was offered, in order to prevent homelessness, but this was disregarded by the applicant, he or she might be considered to have become homeless intentionally. If the advice and support was not available to a vulnerable person, and he or she was not be able to manage his or her affairs without that advice and support, he or she could be considered not to have acted deliberately\(^3\).

\(^1\) Welsh Code, para 17.17(iii).

\(^2\) Welsh Code, para 17.17(iii). There is nothing within H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 or the case law to support that particular interpretation of the word ‘deliberate’.

\(^3\) Welsh Code, para 17.17(iii).
13.75 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

Welsh Code, para 17.21–17.23: the advice applies where the person’s acts or omissions led to the loss of accommodation which he or she was occupying, not, of course, to any failure to accept advice designed to find alternative accommodation.

(3) Lacking foresight or prudence

13.76 The act or omission may have been imprudent or have been a result of lack of foresight. If the applicant acted in good faith, it will not generally be considered that such act or omission was deliberate.

English Code, para 9.17(e); Welsh Code, para 17.17(iv).

(4) Financial difficulties beyond the applicant’s control

13.77 The Codes give examples of a tenant not paying the rent as a result of housing benefit or universal credit delays, or financial difficulties which were beyond the applicant’s control. Where the applicant was genuinely unable to keep up rent (or mortgage) payments, even after claiming benefits, and there was no further financial help available, giving up possession of the home would not generally be considered deliberate. However, in those circumstances, the local housing authority is entitled to consider why the arrears accrued and the applicant’s ability to meet the commitment to pay housing costs at the time that it was taken on. That is because the ‘act’ of the applicant, which may have ultimately caused his or her homelessness, could have been the taking out of an impossible rent or mortgage commitment in the first place. The Welsh Code also advises that changes to the welfare benefit system may result in increased numbers of people struggling to meet their housing costs and that applicants should not be penalised where their previously affordable accommodation became unaffordable as a result of changes in the local housing allowance or housing benefit. In practice, a similar approach has been adopted by the County Court in the context of HA 1996, Pt 7.

1 English Code, para 9.17(a); Welsh Code, paras 17.17(i) and 17.18. See 13.189–13.198.
2 English Code, para 9.18; Welsh Code, paras 17.17(i) and 17.18. For an example, see Adekunle v Islington London Borough Council (2009) November Legal Action, p 25, Mayor’s and City of London County Court.
4 Welsh Code, para 8.30.
5 In Magoury v Brent London Borough Council (2016) February Legal Action, p 46, County Court at Central London, a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally was quashed where there had been a failure to consider whether she would have become homeless anyway as a result of the benefit cap set under the Welfare Reform Act 2012, Pt 5. Similarly, Barker v Watford City Council (2017) July/August Legal Action, p 42, County Court at Central London, involved a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally in circumstances where she had lost her accommodation as a result of welfare reforms which left a shortfall between her housing benefit award and her rent. The local housing authority decided that the applicant’s property was affordable, and therefore reasonable to continue to occupy, as she could have applied for discretionary housing payments. The decision was quashed on appeal. The local housing authority had failed to make any inquiries to establish whether such an application would succeed or for how long any award would be made.
Under duress

The English Code advises that an act or omission made when the applicant was under duress should not generally be considered deliberate\(^1\). There is no further explanation. An example would presumably be someone subjected to domestic violence who is required by his or her partner to give up any legal interest in the home\(^2\).

Serving a prison sentence

The Welsh Code gives an example of a prisoner who has just served a sentence (and presumably lost his or her accommodation during the term of imprisonment) for offences which were not in themselves breaches of his or her tenancy agreement\(^1\). This reflects the Welsh Government’s view that ‘the actions that caused the person to be imprisoned . . . should not be considered as grounds for regarding him or her as intentionally homeless’, unless the offence which resulted in the sentence of imprisonment was a direct breach of the prisoner’s tenancy agreement and led to the landlord obtaining possession of the property\(^2\).

Acts or omissions that may be regarded as ‘deliberate’

The Codes of Guidance suggest a number of circumstances in which acts or omissions of applicants “may be regarded as deliberate”\(^1\).

Voluntary sale or voluntary non-payment of housing costs

If an applicant has chosen to sell his or her home where there was no risk of losing it, that action will generally be treated as having been ‘deliberate’\(^1\). The question of whether any resultant homelessness was intentional will turn on other aspects of the statutory definition, eg whether it would have been reasonable to have continued in occupation of that home\(^2\).

\(^{1}\) English Code, para 9.20; Welsh Code, para 17.23.

13.83 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

13.83 Where a home has been lost for failure to meet liabilities for housing costs and where any rent or mortgage arrears accrued as a result of a ‘wilful and persistent refusal to pay’, the omission to pay will generally be treated as having been ‘deliberate’\(^1\). The Codes’ emphasis on persistent and wilful default underscores the obvious point that non-payment caused by lack of funds will not be deliberate\(^2\). ‘Wilful default’ in making payment, however, is sufficient to establish a deliberate omission\(^3\).

\(^3\) R v Wyre Borough Council ex p Joyce (1983) 11 HLR 73, QBD, discussed at 13.197.

(2) Neglecting affairs

13.84 An omission may be regarded as deliberate where the applicant ‘could be said to have significantly neglected their affairs having disregarded sound advice from qualified people’\(^1\). Into the scope of this example would fall an applicant who temporarily left accommodation without making arrangements for the rent to be paid in his or her absence\(^2\). Similarly, in Viackiene v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council\(^3\) a joint tenant who declined an offer from her landlord to assist her in replacing her impecunious co-tenant, was found to have acted deliberately when she was subsequently evicted for rent arrears.

\(^1\) English Code, para 9.20(c); Welsh Code, para 17.23(iii).

\(^2\) R v Wycombe District Council ex p Mahsood (1988) 20 HLR 683, QBD.

\(^3\) [2013] EWCA Civ 1764, [2014] HLR 13, CA.

13.85 The courts have held that, where someone had been given inaccurate advice, or no advice at all, from a local housing authority and had therefore acted in ignorance of his or her legal rights, then the applicant’s actions should not be construed as ‘deliberate’\(^1\).

(3) Giving up a home

13.86 The Codes advise that voluntary surrender of adequate accommodation in this country or abroad which it would have been reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy may be regarded as a deliberate act\(^.\) Again, whether the applicant is likely to be found to have become homeless intentionally will turn on other parts of the statutory definition and, in particular, on whether it would have been reasonable to have continued occupying the accommodation given up\(^1\).

\(^1\) English Code, para 9.20(d); Welsh Code, para 17.23(iv). See 13.234.

The statutory meaning 13.90

13.87 Where a father had permitted his three children to move from perfectly suitable accommodation with their mother to his one room accommodation, and, as a result of the presence of the children, he was then required to leave by his landlord, his conduct had been deliberate.1

(4) Eviction for anti-social behaviour

13.88 The Codes suggest that where someone is evicted because of anti-social behaviour, nuisance to neighbours or harassment, that behaviour may be treated as having been deliberate. The nuisance or anti-social behaviour that brought about the eviction will often have been the deliberate ‘act’ of the applicant. In other cases, the applicant’s deliberate ‘omission’ may have been his or her failure to control or remove the perpetrator of the nuisance, thus constituting his or her acquiescence in the perpetrator’s nuisance behaviour. In such cases, a local housing authority is entitled to consider the behaviour of the family as a whole and to come to a decision that the applicant had either acquiesced in, or failed to prevent, the nuisance behaviour which had resulted in the family’s eviction. A tenant subject to a possession order on the grounds of waste to the property or deterioration of the furniture may also be considered to have committed a deliberate act (damage) or omission (failure to maintain).2

3 R v East Hertfordshire District Council ex p Robinson (1986) 18 HLR 515, QBD.
4 R v Sevenoaks District Council ex p Reynolds (1990) 22 HLR 250, CA.

13.89 Local housing authorities need not restrict their application of this guidance to cases where tenants enjoying security of tenure have been subject to possession orders under one or more of the ‘fault’ grounds for possession. If a private landlord refuses to renew an assured shorthold tenancy, and subsequently obtains a possession order following service of a notice given under the Housing Act 1988, s 21, the local housing authority is entitled to consider the reason for the landlord seeking possession. If it was due to the fault of the tenant, or members of the tenant’s household, the loss of accommodation may be found to have been caused by the deliberate act of, or omission by, the tenant.3

1 Housing Act 1988, Sch 2, Pt 1 and Housing Act 1985, Sch 2.

(5) Inflicting violence

13.90 Perpetrators of ‘violence’ or ‘threats of violence’, as defined by HA 1996, Pt 7, or ‘abuse’ as defined by H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, who are evicted because of their behaviour, may be considered to have committed a deliberate
13.90 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

act¹. Such an eviction may arise from the former landlord applying for possession on one or more of the grounds that specifically relate to nuisance, criminal convictions or domestic violence⁴, or as a result of the victim of domestic violence either:

(1) obtaining an occupation order in family court proceedings requiring the perpetrator to leave⁵; or

(2) bringing the tenancy to an end by notice.

(6) Giving up tied accommodation

13.91 Where an applicant has been living in tied accommodation and leaves his or her job, thereby losing the accommodation, the local housing authority may well find that there has been a ‘deliberate’ act¹. The Codes advise local housing authorities to consider whether it would have been reasonable for the employee to have continued in the employment and/or reasonable to have continued to occupy the accommodation. If the applicant has been dismissed, the local housing authority should make inquiries to ascertain whether the acts or omissions leading to the applicant’s dismissal were the applicant’s ‘deliberate’ acts or omissions. The English Code recommends that former members of the armed forces, who are required to vacate service quarters as a result of giving notice to leave the service, should not be considered to have become homeless intentionally².

¹ English Code, para 9.20(g); Welsh Code, para 17.23(vii); and R v Kyle and Carrick District Council ex p Speck 1993 GWD 1566, OH.

Summary of ‘deliberate’ act or omission

13.92 In summary, a ‘deliberate’ act or omission is one that:

• is freely made;
• by a person (the applicant) in possession of all the relevant facts;
• who is not forced to act (or fail to act); and
• who is not unaware of a relevant fact.

13.93 If the applicant was unaware of a relevant fact, his or her act or omission will not be considered deliberate if he or she acted in good faith, ie he or she was genuinely ignorant of that relevant fact and that ignorance was not based on an unrealistic degree of optimism, a shutting of eyes to the obvious, or on dishonesty.

13.94 Even if the local housing authority finds that this limb of the test is satisfied, it cannot find that the applicant has become homeless intentionally unless the other five limbs' are also made out.

Was the deliberate act or omission by the applicant?

13.95 Each applicant is entitled to individual consideration of his or her application. This means that even where one member of a household has been found to have become homeless intentionally, an application from another member must still be individually considered providing that he or she has the legal capacity to make an application¹. For this reason it is inappropriate to use the term ‘intentionally homeless family’. An applicant can only be found to have become homeless intentionally if it was his or her deliberate act or omission that caused the homelessness². However, where an applicant has acquiesced to the deliberate act or omission of another which led to the loss of accommodation, then the applicant’s failure to prevent the other from acting or failing to act in a particular way may be characterised as a deliberate act or omission on the part of the applicant. In this way an applicant may assume responsibility for the conduct of another.

¹ See 8.42 and note the distinct rules for 16- and 17-year-olds. A child aged 16 or 17 years old who is dependents on parents who have become homeless intentionally cannot circumvent the rules on becoming homeless intentionally by making an application on behalf of the household. In such a case the local housing authority should still accept the application and determine whether or not the child is, as a matter of fact, a dependant. But where the child is found to be dependent on his or her parents, the child will not have a priority need, thereby limiting the extent of duties that will be owed to the household. See R (SD) v Oxford City Council [2015] EWHC 1871 (Admin), (2015) October Legal Action, p 41, Admin Ct.

² English Code, para 9.9; Welsh Code, para 17.15; R v North Devon District Council ex p Lewis [1981] 1 WLR 328, QBD; and City of Gloucester v Miles (1985) 17 HLR 292, CA.

13.96 In instances where one member of the household’s conduct has been such that he or she would be regarded as having deliberately acted or failed to act in such a way as to cause the homelessness, there is an evidential presumption (or a local housing authority is entitled to make an assumption or draw an inference), in the absence of any material indicating the contrary, that the other household members were party to that conduct¹. However, once there are positive assertions by an applicant (or some other evidence) that there was no acquiescence, such as one partner asserting that he or she had always protested at the other partner’s failure to pay the rent or mortgage, that will be sufficient to rebut the presumption and the local housing authority must inquire into the issue fully².

¹ English Code, paras 9.5 and 9.11; Welsh Code, para 17.13. See further R v North Devon District Council ex p Lewis [1981] 1 WLR 328, QBD.

13.97 The case law is replete with examples of everyday situations in which the question has arisen as to whether the applicant acquiesced in the conduct... of another household member. This includes situations in which the other household member has:

- failed to pay the rent in circumstances where both partners were involved in managing the household’s finances;¹
- terminated a joint tenancy;²
- given up his or her job (to which tied accommodation was linked);³
- changed jobs (from one to which future re-housing was linked to another with no promise of re-housing);⁴
- misspent the money earmarked for housing costs (whether on drink, drugs or gambling);⁵
- caused nuisance or annoyance to others; or
- as head of the household, taken the family from secure to insecure accommodation; or
- withheld the rent in the mistaken belief that there was an entitlement to do so on account of disrepair; or
- re-mortgaged the home to such an extent that the debt became unmanageable⁶.

⁷ R v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council ex p Khatun (Asma) (1993) 27 HLR 344, CA, where the wife was found to have acquiesced by having been content to leave the decisions to her husband.
⁸ R v Nottingham City Council ex p Caine (1995) 28 HLR 374, CA, where the decision that the applicant had acquiesced was upheld, as she must have known of the non-payment. See also Enfield London Borough Council v Nairn [2015] EWCA Civ 319, [2015] HLR 19, CA.
⁹ R v Barnet London Borough Council ex p O’Connor (1990) 22 HLR 486, QBD, where the decision that the wife had acquiesced was upheld – she had said that she left financial matters to her husband, but had signed two mortgage applications on which she had made false representations.

In summary, the deliberate act or omission must have been by the applicant. In cases where the deliberate act or omission was by another member of the applicant's household, a local housing authority is entitled to presume that the applicant acquiesced in that conduct unless there is an assertion, or evidence, that the applicant did not acquiesce. Where there is an assertion, or evidence, that the applicant did not acquiesce, the local housing authority must then make full inquiries into the issue.

In the unusual case of Bellamy v Hounslow London Borough Council [2006] EWCA Civ 535, [2006] HLR 42, CA, the applicant’s account was that she was not aware that she, as a legal joint owner of her home with her mother, had a power to object to a sale. The local housing authority did not believe the applicant and the Court of Appeal held that the local housing authority had been entitled not to believe her.

Even if the local housing authority finds that this limb of the test is satisfied, it cannot find that the applicant has become homeless intentionally unless the other five limbs are also made out.

See 13.36.

Causation

Causation in the law has been described as a “notoriously difficult” subject, and this is certainly so when it comes to judging whether a person has become homeless intentionally. In this context, there are two situations in which the issue of causation arises. Firstly, in deciding whether or not the applicant ceased to occupy accommodation in consequence his or her deliberate act or omission. Secondly, in deciding whether the applicant’s deliberate act (or omission), and the cessation of occupation it caused, remains an operative cause of the present homelessness. Before turning to these two respective topics, we begin with some general remarks regarding the Supreme Court decision in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council which provides the most authoritative guidance on causation in the context of becoming homeless intentionally—to show the relationship between these two questions of causation and how it is that the second question, which does not obviously form part of the statutory rubric, arises at all.

Ms Haile was an assured shorthold tenant of a room. It was a term of her tenancy that only one person could reside in the room. The tenancy also entitled her to use of the kitchen shared with other residents. She became unhappy with the accommodation, moved out and later applied to Waltham Forest London Borough Council as homeless. Ms Haile informed Waltham Forest of a number of occasions that she had moved out of the accommodation owing to unpleasant smells caused by the other residents cooking. Subsequently Ms Haile gave birth to a girl. At this juncture, if she had still be living in the room, she would have had to move out in any event since the tenancy agreement would not have permitted her to reside there with her daughter.

13.102 Several months later Waltham Forest issued a decision finding that Ms Haile had become homeless intentionally. This decision was upheld on review and on appeal to the County Court. The Court of Appeal dismissed a second appeal on the basis that the decision of the House of Lords in Din v Wandsworth London Borough Council, involving the analogous provisions under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, remained binding and was determinative of the issue. The decision as to whether an applicant has become homeless intentionally, the Court of Appeal said, was to be made based on the facts as they existed at the time the applicant left his or her accommodation. If the applicant became homeless intentionally at that point, the fact that subsequent developments would have rendered him or her homeless in any event was irrelevant.

13.103 The Supreme Court allowed Ms Haile’s appeal. It held that in deciding whether a person is owed the main housing duty under HA 1996, s 193(2), or the duty to secure accommodation pursuant to H(W)A 2014, s 75(2), in circumstances where a question arises as to whether the applicant has become homeless intentionally, a two-stage test should be applied in considering causation.

1 Lord Carnwath dissenting.
2 The case was decided under HA 1996, s 191 but the reasoning would apply with equal force to H(W)A 2014, s 77 which is drafted in similar terms.
3 [2015] UKSC 34, [2015] AC 1471, SC per Lord Reed at [25].

13.104 First, the local housing authority should consider whether the applicant became homeless intentionally within the meaning of HA 1996, s 191(1) and H(W)A 2014, s 77(2), ie whether he or she deliberately failed to do anything in consequence of which he or she ceased to occupy accommodation. This issue is dealt with at 13.112–13.132.

13.105 Second, the local housing authority should consider for the purposes of HA 1996, s 193(1) and H(W)A 2014, s 75(2)(d), whether the applicant’s current homelessness, has been caused by his or her intentional conduct or whether the causal chain has been broken by subsequent events. This issue is dealt with at 13.133–13.154.

13.106 The causal chain will be broken in the following circumstances:

- where it can no longer ‘reasonably be said’ that ‘but for’ the applicant’s conduct he or she would not currently be homeless; or
- where the ‘proximate cause of the homelessness is an event which is unconnected to the applicant’s own earlier conduct, and in the absence of which homelessness would probably not have occurred’.

1 Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council [2015] UKSC 34, [2015] AC 1471, SC per Lord Reed at [63].
This approach was consistent with the purpose of the legislative provisions which is to prevent applicants ‘queue jumping’ and obtaining accommodation by deliberately making themselves homeless. In Ms Haile’s case it could not be said that ‘but for’ her deliberate conduct in leaving the room she would not have been homeless since she would have become homeless in any event following the subsequent birth of her child. Din was distinguished on the ‘narrow ground’ that there was no such later causative event in that case, ‘merely a possibility that one might well have occurred’.

1 Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council [2015] UKSC 34, [2015] AC 1471, SC per Lord Reed at [22].

The distinction between the two stages of the test in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council is significant though certainly not straightforward. To understand the nature of the two-stage test, it may assist to consider a timeline. At the beginning of the timeline there is a deliberate act or omission by the applicant. At the centre of the timeline there is the point at which the applicant ceases to occupy his or her accommodation. The timeline ends at the date of the local housing authority’s review decision.

1 [2015] UKSC 34, [2015] AC 1471, SC.

The first stage of the test is concerned with the first half of the time-line, and involves consideration of events prior to the cessation of occupation. The local housing authority must consider whether the applicant’s deliberate act was the cause of his or her ceasing to occupy the accommodation. In some cases there may be multiple factors which all contributed toward the applicant giving up his or her accommodation and the local housing authority must determine the operative cause. In other cases there may be an intervening event that occurred between the deliberate act and the cessation of occupation and the local housing authority must consider whether this has broken the causal chain. This part of the test reflects the orthodox approach to assessing intentional homelessness which had hitherto prevailed.

1 See 13.112–13.132.
4 Din v Wandsworth London Borough Council [1983] AC 657, HL.

Where the operative cause of the cessation of occupation was a deliberate act or omission of the applicant it falls to the local housing authority to move on to the second stage. The second stage of the test involves the second half of the time line and involves consideration of whether there has been a supervening event that has happened since the applicant ceased to occupy the accommodation meaning that his or her deliberate act can no longer reasonably be regarded as the operative cause of his current homelessness at the time of application or review. This aspect of the test ‘has to be understood as being implicit if absurd consequences are to be avoided’.

13.110
13.110 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

example, an elderly man who becomes homeless when his care home was closed cannot be intended to be denied assistance under HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 merely because, 60 years earlier, he was evicted from his student digs for holding rowdy parties¹.

⁴ See Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council [2015] UKSC 34, [2015] AC 1471, SC per Lord Reed at [23]. Presumably in this scenario the causal chain would have been broken by the supervening period in settled accommodation. See 13.136–13.146.

13.111 It is this second stage of the test which is the novel aspect of the court’s decision, and marks the real development in the law. Strictly, the notion that the causal chain may be broken by subsequent events is not a new one. For example, the occupation of ‘settled accommodation’¹, following an earlier loss of accommodation is a well-established means by which the causal chain may be broken. But the Supreme Court in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council², for the first time, has provided a clear explanation, rooted in the language of HA 1996, Pt 7³, to explain how and why the causal chain may be broken, and in doing so has confirmed unequivocally that supervening events other than a period of time spent in settled accommodation may suffice to break the causal chain. We will now consider the two stages of the test in detail.

³ As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

Was it as a consequence of a deliberate act or omission that the applicant ceased to occupy accommodation?

13.112 This requires consideration of two elements:

(1) Has there been any cessation of occupation at all?
(2) If so, did the deliberate act or omission cause the cessation of occupation?

13.113 Only if both are answered affirmatively will this limb of the statutory definition be made out.

Has there been any cessation of occupation at all?

13.114 The deliberate act or omission must have the consequence that the applicant ‘ceases to occupy’ accommodation¹. Accordingly, the applicant must have actually occupied the accommodation the loss of which was caused by his or her deliberate act or omission². Failing to take up an offer of accommodation will not suffice³. Likewise ‘the mere right to possession is not enough’⁴. However, at the other end of the spectrum, there need not have been continuous occupation at all times, but the accommodation must at least have been at the disposal of the applicant and available for his or her occupation at the time it was given up.

1 HA 1996, s 191(1); H(W)A 2014, s 77(2).
3 English Code, para 9.12.
5 See the unusual facts of R v Westminster City Council ex p Khan (1991) 23 HLR 230, QBD, where the applicant had not actually occupied the accommodation, but it was held to have been at her disposal and available for her occupation; and see Lee-Lawrence v Penwith District Council [2006] EWCA Civ 1672, (2006) July Legal Action, p 29, CA, where holding the keys to a house provided on a tenancy and claiming housing benefit in order to pay the rent was held to be sufficient evidence to uphold a finding of occupation for the purposes of HA 1996, s 191(1).

13.115 The accommodation the applicant has ceased to occupy may have been anywhere in the world; local housing authorities are not restricted to considering accommodation the applicant has occupied in the UK.

1 English Code, para 9.12.

13.116 It follows that decisions by applicants:

(1) to rid themselves of accommodation that they have not occupied; or
(2) not to accept accommodation offered to them to occupy, cannot result in findings that they have become homeless intentionally. In R v Wandsworth London Borough Council ex p Oteng, the applicant left a home that she shared with her two sisters and, over two years later, she transferred her interest in the property to her mother. The local housing authority decided that she had become homeless intentionally as a result of voluntarily transferring her interest. The Court of Appeal rejected that approach. The transfer of interest had not caused the applicant to cease to occupy the accommodation – that had occurred two years earlier.

2 In Quaid v Westminster City Council (2008) February Legal Action, p 41, Central London County Court, the applicant had committed offences while he was street homeless. He subsequently acquired a place at a Salvation Army hostel. He was convicted of those offences, sent to prison and lost the hostel place. The local housing authority found that he had become homeless intentionally as a result of the offences committed. The decision was varied to a decision that he had not become homeless intentionally. The commission of the offences had not caused the loss of the hostel place.

13.117 Applying the correct approach, homeless applicants in temporary accommodation provided under HA 1996, Pt 7 who refuse offers of accommodation cannot become homeless intentionally from the accommodation that they refuse, as they have never occupied it (although they may be found to have become homeless intentionally from temporary accommodation lost as a result of their refusal of other accommodation). However, in such cases, local housing authorities should consider whether it was the refusal that caused the loss of the temporary accommodation, or whether there was some other reason for its loss.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
13.117 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

2 English Code, para 9.12. See also R v Brent London Borough Council ex p Awua [1996] AC 55, HL and Johnston v Westminster City Council [2015] EWCA Civ 554, (2015) Legal Action, p 54, CA (10.18–10.20) for another example of the issues that may arise in this type of situation. In the latter case Westminster found that the applicant was not homeless, as he was owed the main housing duty by another local housing authority. The Court of Appeal held that this was wrong in law. The fact that another local housing authority was willing to provide unspecified accommodation did not prevent the applicant from qualifying as homeless, since no such accommodation had actually been made available at the time of the decision.

Did the act or omission cause the cessation of occupation?

13.118 This is the first stage of the two-stage test identified by the Supreme Court in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council1.

Identifying the effective or operative causes of the loss of accommodation

13.119 In most situations, there will be a number of events that, taken together, caused the applicant to cease to occupy the accommodation. Some of those events may not be the direct cause of the loss of the accommodation, but may have started off the chain of events that led to the loss of accommodation (linear causation). Sometimes there will be a number of independent contributing factors operating at the same time (parallel causation)2.

13.120 HA 1996, Pt 7; and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 use the word ‘anything’ to refer to what has been done (or failed to be done)2. However, the subject of inquiry is not every act or omission in which the applicant engaged at the time she or he became homeless, or in the lead-up to that time. HA 1996, Pt 71 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 are concerned only with the doing of (or failure to do) something ‘in consequence of which’ the applicant ceased to occupy his or her accommodation.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 HA 1996, s 191(1); H(W)A 2014, s 77(2).
3 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

13.121 It is necessary, therefore, to identify the operative or effective cause of the loss of accommodation, and then to consider whether that was the applicant’s deliberate act or omission3. This should be answered in a practical, common-sense way. It is more than a ‘but-for’ test. The operative cause can be doing (or failing to do) ‘anything’⁴. Where there are multiple parallel causes, if just one of the causes was the applicant’s deliberate act or omission, that will be sufficient for the applicant to fall within this limb of the definition of having become homeless intentionally⁵. This is a question of fact for the local housing authority to determine⁶.

1. The words ‘effective’ and ‘operative’ have been used interchangeably in the case law.

5. O’Connor v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council [2004] EWCA Civ 394, [2004] HLR 37, CA. For example, in Noel v Hillingdon London Borough Council [2013] EWCA Civ 1602, [2014] HLR 10, CA, the local housing authority was entitled to find that it was a failure to apply for an increase in housing benefit that was the effective cause of the applicant’s homelessness rather than the taking of an unaffordable tenancy.

13.122 Various judges have commented on the difficulties involved in establishing the cause or causes of the loss of accommodation. In R v Hackney London Borough Council ex p Ajayi¹, Dyson J said:

‘Questions of causation are notoriously difficult and, in my judgment, the Court should be slow to intervene to strike down the decisions of administrative bodies on such questions and should do so only in clear cases. I cannot accept that the effective cause should always be regarded in these cases as the chronologically immediate or proximate cause. In some cases, the cause closest in point of time will be regarded as the effective cause . . . In others, the cause closest in time will be not so regarded⁷.’

13.123 In O’Connor v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council the applicant’s father was terminally ill and the whole family travelled to Ireland to his bedside, starting off a chain of events that eventually resulted in the loss of their accommodation in London. The father’s illness was not an act or omission of the applicants and, although the decision to travel to Ireland was the applicants’ act:

‘ . . . nobody but a logician would say that it was in consequence of the family’s going to Ireland to see a sick relative that they lost their accommodation⁸.’

THE ’REASONABLE LIKELIHOOD’ TEST

13.124 A loss of accommodation must have occurred as a consequence of the applicant’s deliberate act or omission. This does not mean that there needs to be any immediate link between the nature of the act done (or the omission) and the loss of accommodation. In Chishimba v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council, in relation to instances of linear causation, Lewison LJ observed that ‘if a series of dominoes falls over it does not matter that the applicant did not knock over the last domino if he set the domino effect in motion’. An applicant who deliberately gambles at a casino and loses every resource he or she has, has done an act (the gambling) that is in itself entirely unrelated to the accommodation subsequently lost for failure to pay housing costs. A convicted international drug dealer who, while in prison, has his or her house confiscated and sold as a proceed of crime, has done an act (criminal drug dealing) wholly unrelated to the former home. The issue, however, is not whether the loss of the home was the intended consequence of the deliberate act or omission but whether it is a consequence.

1. [2013] EWCA Civ 786, [2013] HLR 34, CA per Lewison LJ at [9].

13.125 This is not to say that acts or omissions wholly removed from any connection at all with the eventual loss of accommodation can always be counted if they, as a matter of fact, did ‘cause’ that loss. Without any sensible restraint on the plain words, absurd decisions might be made, eg that a father who chastised his son too harshly for the liking of the mother (who then excluded the father from her home) had lost his accommodation in consequence of the deliberate act of chastisement. In cases of linear causation, the courts have, accordingly, striven to identify a narrower basis on which the link between the act and its consequences must be made out rather than a simple test of strict causation. Through the case law a test of ‘reasonable likelihood’ has emerged by way of a control mechanism. The question to be posed is: ‘Was the loss of the accommodation the reasonably likely result of what the applicant did?’ Rather more straightforwardly, one judge has suggested that the correct approach is:

- to look at what the applicant did;
- find that the ultimate result was loss of accommodation; and
- then to ask ‘if the fair-minded bystander could say to himself, “He asked for it”’.

3. Robinson v Torbay District Council [1982] 1 All ER 726, QBD per HHJ Goodall at 731.

13.126 This approach of ‘reasonable likelihood’ has been approved by the Court of Appeal and subsumed into the English Code, and is to be preferred to a test of whether the act done was too ‘remote’ from the resultant loss of accommodation.

The statutory meaning 13.129

1 English Code, para 9.13.
2 R v Thanet District Council ex p Reeve (1981) 6 HLR 31, QBD.

13.127 A helpful formulation of the correct approach given by the Court of Appeal is:

‘What is called for, then, in a case where there are potentially multiple causes of an applicant’s homelessness, is a careful judgment on the particular facts looking to see whether homelessness is shown to have been a likely consequence of the applicant’s deliberate act, bearing in mind that it is the applicant’s own responsibility for his homelessness that the statute is looking for. The precise question to be asked and answered of course relates to the time when the applicant in fact became homeless: that is the result of their Lordships’ decision in Din1.’

13.128 Applying this approach, former prisoners, who are homeless on their release, face being found to have become homeless intentionally if the reasonably likely result of their deliberate acts in committing criminal offences, viewed objectively, was a sentence of imprisonment resulting in the loss of their accommodation1.

1 R v Hounslow London Borough Council ex p R (1997) 29 HLR 939, QBD; Minchin v Sheffield City Council (2000) The Times, 26 August, CA, and Stewart v Lambeth London Borough Council [2002] EWCA Civ 753, [2002] 34 HLR 40, CA. See further English Code, paras 23.21–23.22. The Welsh Code, however, advises local housing authorities in Wales against finding that the applicant became homeless intentionally in such circumstances, unless the acts, which led to the applicant’s imprisonment, were also breaches of his or her tenancy and led to the landlord obtaining possession of the property: Welsh Code, para 17.26. See 13.237–13.238.

Intervening events

13.129 The causative link between the deliberate act or omission and the actual loss of accommodation must be in place throughout. An independent act or omission of a third party that actually causes the loss of accommodation will break that link. For example, an applicant may be on the brink of having his or her home repossessed for non-payment of rent or a mortgage, but if, on the eve of eviction, the house is burnt down by a third party, the homelessness cannot have been intentional, as it was not a consequence of the applicant’s omission to pay1. In Gloucester City Council v Miles2, the applicant left her home, but (because she did not give up her tenancy) she was not homeless. Finding her gone, her husband vandalised the home, rendering it uninhabitable; his act rendered her homeless. As Stephenson LJ put it:

‘The relevant questions – when, how and why did she become homeless – admit of only one answer: on vandalisation of her home.’

1 See Cox v Brent London Borough Council [2015] EWCA Civ 1551, CA, however for a variation on this set of facts, where the Court of Appeal refused permission to bring a second appeal against a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally.
13.129 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

13.130 Again, loss of accommodation by prisoners can provide classic examples of the operation of these provisions. Many prisoners will find difficulty in paying rent for their homes whilst they are in custody. Rent arrears and consequent loss of the tenancy may be inevitable¹. But if the landlord wrongfully reposesses without a court order, it will be that illegal eviction that actually causes the homelessness and the prisoner cannot have become homeless intentionally². If the prisoner asks a third party to pay the rent and that third party fails to pay, that may, depending on the facts, result in a decision that the prisoner became homeless intentionally (because the prisoner has failed to make an effective arrangement)³, or in a decision that the prisoner became homeless unintentionally (where a proper and genuine arrangement is frustrated by the third party stealing the prisoner’s money rather than paying the rent).

¹ The Welsh Code, however, advises local housing authorities in Wales against finding that the applicant became homeless intentionally in such circumstances, unless the acts, which led to the applicant’s imprisonment, were also breaches of his or her tenancy and led to the landlord obtaining possession of the property: Welsh Code, para 17.26(ii).

Summary

13.131 In summary, the deliberate act or omission by the applicant must have caused him or her actually to cease to occupy accommodation. An applicant’s decision to rid himself or herself of accommodation that he or she was not occupying, or to refuse an offer of accommodation, cannot fall within this limb of the test since there will have been no cessation of occupation. In deciding whether the deliberate act or omission caused the cessation of occupation, the following principles should be taken into account:

- the task is to identify the real or effective cause of the homelessness, which should be approached in a practical common-sense way;
- where there are a number of independent factors which separately contributed to the loss of accommodation (parallel causation) it suffices if one of them is the deliberate act or omission of the applicant. This is a question of fact for the local housing authority;
- where a sequence of connected events led to the cessation of occupation (linear causation or ‘the domino effect’), the control mechanism is whether it was reasonably likely that the act or omission would result in homelessness; and
- the causal chain will be broken by an intervening independent act or omission of a third party.
Even if the local housing authority finds that this limb of the test is satisfied, it cannot find that the applicant has become homeless intentionally unless the other five limbs\(^1\) are also made out.

Is the deliberate act (or omission), and the cessation of occupation it caused, an operative cause of the present homelessness?

Particularly in those cases where there has been a significant passage of time or change in circumstances between an applicant ceasing to occupy accommodation and applying as homeless, it may be necessary to consider whether his or her deliberate act (or omission), and the cessation of occupation it caused, remains an operative cause of the present homelessness. This is the second stage of the two-stage test set down by the Supreme Court in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council. It requires the local housing authority to consider for the purposes of HA 1996, s 193(1) and H(W)A 2014, s 75(2)(d), whether the applicant's current homelessness has been caused by his or her intentional conduct or whether the causal chain has been broken by subsequent events.

The question of causation also arises in the context of the earlier decision as to whether or not the applicant ceased to occupy accommodation in consequence his or her deliberate act or omission. See 13.112–13.132.

The causal chain will be broken in the following circumstances:

- where it can no longer 'reasonably be said' that 'but for' the applicant's conduct he or she would not currently be homeless; or
- where the 'proximate cause of the homelessness is an event which is unconnected to the applicant's own earlier conduct, and in the absence of which homelessness would probably not have occurred'\(^1\).

The remainder of this section of this chapter will consider the concept of 'settled accommodation', one of the well-established means by which the causal chain may be broken, before going on to consider other events that may break the causal chain.

Supervening events - settled accommodation

The Supreme Court in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council endorsed the well-established principle, that an applicant's deliberate act (or omission), and the cessation of occupation it caused, will no longer be regarded as an operative cause of his or her present homelessness,
13.136 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

where he or she has spent a subsequent period in ‘settled accommodation’\(^2\). The English Code advises that local housing authorities look back only to ‘the last period of settled accommodation’ and examine why the applicant left that.

\(^1\) [2015] UKSC 34, [2015] AC 1471, SC.
\(^3\) English Code, para 9.13. The Welsh Code contains a paucity of guidance on this issue. See Welsh Code, para 17.32.

13.137 The advice in the English Code echoes the approach taken by the courts. They have decided that past intentional homelessness can be expunged by the subsequent acquisition of ‘settled’ accommodation. The phrase was first coined by Ackner LJ in Din v Wandsworth London Borough Council\(^1\). He said:

‘To remove his self-imposed disqualification, he must therefore have achieved what can be loosely described as “a settled residence”, as opposed to what from the outset is known ... to be only temporary accommodation. What amounts to “a settled residence” is a question of fact and degree depending upon the circumstances of each individual case.’

13.138 Consequently, where housing was lost in circumstances meeting the statutory definition of becoming homeless intentionally, a local housing authority’s inquiries can be limited to determining those circumstances and then to whether there has been any settled accommodation since that loss of accommodation. The local housing authority is entitled to ignore the acquisition and loss of temporary or insecure accommodation (even if occupation of such accommodation brought the applicant’s state of homelessness to an end for a time) and may track back to the loss of the last settled accommodation. That loss, looking at the whole history, may be the real reason for the present homelessness\(^1\).

\(^1\) In accordance with the principle that it is not for the applicant to prove his or her case (see 9.31–9.35 and 13.19–13.28), the local housing authority must consider whether the facts as disclosed by the applicant amount to there being intervening settled accommodation, whether or not the applicant has specifically raised the point (Black v Wandsworth London Borough Council (2008) February Legal Action, p 41, Lambeth County Court).

13.139 Not surprisingly, a whole body of case law has developed as to the circumstances in which accommodation is to be treated as ‘settled’ for the purpose of applying this test. While the matter is one primarily for the local housing authority itself to determine on the facts of the particular application, it should take a careful and measured approach. In the words of one judge:\(^1\):

‘Given the grave difficulty of securing settled accommodation, and given too that the clear legislative objective underlying the concept of intentionality – to discourage people from needlessly leaving their accommodation and becoming homeless – is surely sufficiently achieved without too protracted a period of consequential disqualification from re-housing, it is much to be hoped that housing authorities will

in general interpret benevolently the character of accommodation secured by applicants after a finding of intentionality, namely as to whether or not it is settled.'

13.140 More recently the Court of Appeal has commented that¹:

‘... the length of the period of accommodation relied on is not conclusive as to whether it should be treated as settled in the sense described in Din and the subsequent cases in which the test has been applied. What the applicant needs to establish is a period of occupation under either a licence or a tenancy which has at its outset or during its term a real prospect of continuation for a significant or indefinite period of time so that the applicant’s transition from his earlier accommodation cannot be said to have put him into a more precarious position than he previously enjoyed.’

1 Doka v Southwark London Borough Council [2017] EWCA Civ 1532, [2017] HLR 47, CA per Patten LJ at [18].

13.141 The case-law has thrown up many helpful illustrations of what some local housing authorities have respectively considered unsettled and settled accommodation for these purposes.

Not usually treated as ‘settled’ accommodation

13.142 The following have not usually been treated as settled accommodation:

• holiday lets¹;
• out of season (or, winter) lettings²;
• bed and breakfast or other short-term hostel style accommodation¹;
• tied accommodation linked to short fixed-term employment¹;
• a temporary stay with relatives¹;
• decrepit caravans¹;
• lodging in a council house¹;
• accommodation in another country in breach of immigration laws¹;
• moving in temporarily with a cohabitant¹;
• a statutorily overcrowded and unaffordable assured shorthold tenancy¹⁰;
• precarious occupation, whether as a bare licensee or as an unlawful sub-tenant¹¹;
• occupation in a caravan on a site without permission¹²;
• a licence originally granted pursuant to the HA 1996, s 190(2) short-term accommodation duty¹³; or
• a non-secure tenancy provided in performance of the HA 1996, s 193(2) main housing duty¹⁴.

Usually treated as settled accommodation

13.143 The following have usually been treated as settled accommodation:
- freehold or leasehold ownership;
- a tenancy enjoying security of tenure;
- an indefinite licence or permission to occupy;
- returning to long-term occupation of the parental home;
- indefinite stay with friends or relatives; or
- tied accommodation as a long-term employee.

1 Robson v Kyle and Carrick District Council (1994) SCLR 259.

13.144 The most difficult application of the test of ‘settled’ accommodation arises where an applicant who became homeless intentionally has subsequently obtained a tenancy with a private sector landlord. Since February 1997, any such letting will have been on an assured shorthold tenancy (AST) involving hardly any security of tenure. The Court of Appeal has rejected the proposition that, because an AST is the normal or default tenancy in the private sector, it must always count as ‘settled’. The true question for the local housing authority is whether, having regard to the circumstances and terms of its creation, the AST can properly be treated as having provided ‘settled’ accommodation for the applicant.

13.145 The material consideration is (generally) the position at the date of commencement of the new accommodation, since if the causal link is broken at that point nothing that happens thereafter will mend it. Of course, the reverse is also true. An arrangement may not have been ‘settled’ at the outset, but may become so at a later stage (eg when an originally short-term tenancy is renewed for an extended term) and it is at that stage that the causal link from previously having become homeless intentionally may be severed.

1 R v Westminster City Council ex p Obeid (1996) 29 HLR 389, QBD per Carnwath J at 400.

13.146 Properly understood, the application of the ‘settled’ accommodation test is all about cause and effect. The search is for a causal link between past deliberate loss of accommodation and the present homelessness. The local housing authority is really asking itself whether the earlier intentional act is causative of the present homelessness. It will usually conclude that it is, unless there has been some intermediate ‘settled’ accommodation.

Other supervening events breaking the causal link

13.147 Prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council there was a degree of uncertainty as to whether there might potentially be other circumstances in which the causal chain between present unintentional homelessness and having become homelessness intentionally in the past could be broken. In R v Brent London Borough Council ex p Awua, Lord Hoffman reached no concluded view. He said the jurisprudence concerning ‘settled’ accommodation:

‘... is well-established (it was approved by this House in Din’s case) and nothing I have said is intended to cast any doubt upon it, although I would wish to reserve the question of whether the occupation of a settled residence is the sole and exclusive method by which the causal link can be broken’.

13.148 The matter has now been settled beyond doubt by the decision of the Supreme Court in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council. The causal chain may be broken by other events. The following cases provide examples of other events that may be sufficient to break the causal chain.

1 [2015] UKSC 34, [2015] AC 1471, SC.
2 See English Code, para 9.14. The test to be applied in determining whether the causal chain has been broken is set out at 13.134. This present section is concerned with discussing the particular instances where the courts have found the test to be satisfied and the causal chain broken.

13.149 In R v Basingstoke and Deane District Council ex p Bassett, the applicant and her husband gave up secure accommodation to go and stay with her husband’s relations. The marriage then broke down, she left her in-laws’ house and became homeless. She had not had any intervening settled accommodation and the local housing authority considered that she had therefore become homeless intentionally. Taylor J held that the final homelessness resulted from the breakdown of the marriage, not from the decision to give up the settled accommodation.

13.150 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

13.150 R v Harrow London Borough Council ex p Fahia1 concerned an applicant who was found to have deliberately procured her own eviction from accommodation in Harrow of which she was the tenant. She was then provided by the authority with temporary accommodation in a guest house, where she remained for over a year. Her housing benefit was then reduced by half, on the basis that her rent was too high. The landlord then told her that she would be evicted. At first instance, Mr Roger Toulson QC, sitting as a deputy judge, held that the authority had erred in failing to consider whether the causal connection between the applicant’s deliberately procuring her eviction from her accommodation in Harrow, and her homelessness on being evicted from the guest house, had been broken by the reduction in her benefit.2

2 A similar approach was taken in Magoury v Brent London Borough Council (2016) February Legal Action, p 46, County Court at Central London, where a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally was quashed where there had been a failure to consider whether she would have become homeless anyway as a result of the benefit cap set under the Welfare Reform Act, Pt 5.

13.151 In R v Camden London Borough Council ex p Aranda1 the applicant and her husband surrendered their tenancy of a house in Camden and moved to Colombia, where they obtained accommodation. On arrival in Colombia, the applicant was deserted by her husband. With no prospect of employment in Colombia, and no entitlement to social security benefits, she returned to Camden and applied for housing. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the causal connection between her deliberately giving up the accommodation in Camden, and her homelessness after leaving the accommodation in Colombia, had been broken by her husband’s desertion.

13.152 The case of R v Hackney London Borough Council ex p Ajayi1 involved an applicant who left settled accommodation in Nigeria to come to the United Kingdom, where she lived in overcrowded short-term accommodation. She was given notice to leave after she became pregnant. She challenged the local housing authority’s decision that she had become homeless intentionally as a result of having left the accommodation in Nigeria, and argued that the true cause of her homelessness was her pregnancy. On the facts of that particular case, Dyson J held that the local housing authority had been entitled to decide that the effective cause of the applicant’s homelessness was her action in leaving Nigeria.

13.153 Another example of a case where the causal chain was not broken by a supervening event was Stewart v Lambeth London Borough Council1. In that case the applicant ceased to occupy his council flat when he was convicted of a drugs offence and sentenced to imprisonment. While in prison, he was evicted from the flat for non-payment of rent. He had arranged with his sister that the rent should continue to be paid while he was in prison, but she failed to implement the arrangement. It was held that the causal chain connecting his deliberate conduct in committing the offence to his homelessness on release from prison had not been broken. It was accepted that the position might have been different if the arrangement had been implemented for a time but had then broken down.

13.154 Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council involved a case where an assured shorthold tenant ceased to occupy her room in a shared property, complaining of smells from the other residents’ cooking. This act would have been sufficient for her to be regarded as having become homeless intentionally. However, by the time of the review decision she had given birth to a baby girl. The consequence of this was that she would no longer have been able to occupy the room in any event as her tenancy agreement would not have permitted her to reside there with her daughter. The Supreme Court accepted that her deliberate act in leaving the accommodation could no longer be regarded as the cause of her current homelessness and that the causal chain had been broken by the birth of her child.

2 [2015] UKSC 34, [2015] AC 1471, SC per Lord Reed at [67].

Was the accommodation available for the applicant?

13.155 If the applicant deliberately did (or failed to do) something in consequence of which he or she ceased to occupy accommodation, the next question for consideration is whether the accommodation lost was accommodation that was available for his or her occupation.

1 See English Code, para 9.21.

13.156 In HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 the phrase ‘available for his occupation’ has a special meaning. The statutory definition relates both to the physical availability of the accommodation and to the nature and extent of the applicant’s right to occupy it. The same definition is used in determining whether an applicant is ‘homeless’. The detail has already been explored in Chapter 10. The following paragraphs contain only a brief summary.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 HA 1996, s 175(1) and s 176; H(W)A 2014, ss 55(1) and 56. See also English Code, paras 6.5–6.9; Welsh Code, paras 8.6–8.8. See further 10.17–10.65.

13.157 The accommodation must have been available for occupation by the applicant and by any person who normally resided with the applicant as a member of the applicant’s family, and also by any person who might reasonably have been expected to reside with the applicant at the date it was lost.

1 See HA 1996, s 176 and H(W)A 2014, s 56 for the definition of the applicant’s household. See also R v Wimborne Borough Council ex p Curtis (1986) 18 HLR 79, QBD; R v Hammersmith
13.157 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

13.158 The function of this provision is to prevent a finding that the applicant has become homeless intentionally when what the applicant has lost was accommodation that could not actually accommodate his or her household. Frequently, it is applied to split or separated households that have no accommodation in which they can live together. For example:

- A head of household who left his or her home country and took up a hostel room for a single person in the UK will not become homeless intentionally when he or she is later asked to leave that hostel once the family arrives (because the single person’s hostel was not accommodation ‘available’ to the family).¹
- Two young people living in their respective parental homes may develop a relationship and have a child. If neither set of parents will accommodate their child’s partner, neither of the two will become homeless intentionally when the parental home is lost (eg on ejection following a family dispute) because neither partner had accommodation ‘available’ to accommodate the other.²

13.159 However, a father who permitted his three children to leave perfectly satisfactory accommodation that they were occupying with their mother so as to move into his one-room accommodation with him was held to have become homeless intentionally. His deliberate conduct in letting them move in subsequently led to his landlord requiring the family to leave the one room. The distinction between this case and the first example above is that, before the children moved in to live with their father, they did not reside with him and nor was it reasonable to expect that they would do so.¹

13.160 In summary, the accommodation must have been actually available both for the applicant and any person who normally resided with him or her as a member of his or her family and for any person who might reasonably have been expected to reside with him or her at the date it was lost.

13.161 Even if the local housing authority finds that this limb of the test is satisfied, it cannot find that the applicant has become homeless intentionally unless the other five limbs¹ are also made out.

Would it have been reasonable for the applicant to have continued to occupy the accommodation?

13.162 To reach this stage in the application of the ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ test, the local housing authority must have satisfied itself that it was by his or her own deliberate act (or failure to act) that the applicant ceased to occupy available accommodation. The last issue to be settled is whether it would (at the point at which the deliberate act was done) have been reasonable for the applicant to have remained in occupation. It cannot be over-emphasised that the question is not ‘Was it reasonable for the applicant to leave?’ but rather ‘Was it reasonable for the applicant to have continued in occupation?’

1 English Code, para 9.22.

13.163 This reasonableness aspect of the test is the parallel of the part of the definition of ‘homelessness’ which uses exactly the same rubric. Cases decided on whether an applicant is homeless or not homeless, having regard to the reasonableness of continued occupation, are therefore equally relevant to decisions as to whether a person became homelessness intentionally.

1 HA 1996, s 175(3); H(W)A 2014, s 55(3). See also English Code, paras 8.18–8.32; Welsh Code, paras 6.23–6.41. See further 10.73–10.124 for a more detailed discussion of this statutory requirement.

13.164 The question of whether accommodation was ‘reasonable to continue to occupy’ involves consideration of all the circumstances at the time of the applicant’s deliberate act or omission, and is not limited to the physical quality of the accommodation that the applicant has ceased to occupy.

1 R v Broxbourne Borough Council ex p Willmoth (1989) 22 HLR 118, CA. See Moran v Manchester City Council, Richards v Ipswich Borough Council [2008] EWCA Civ 378 per Wilson LJ at [49]–[50]. The case went to the House of Lords, which decided the discrete issue that women’s refuges could not be accommodation that was reasonable for an applicant and her household to continue to occupy; Ali & others v Birmingham City Council, Moran v Manchester City Council [2009] UKHL 36, [2009] 1 WLR 1506, HL. However, their Lordships did not specifically overrule the list of general considerations set out by Wilson LJ at [49]. See 10.103.

13.165 When considering whether accommodation was reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy, a local housing authority is directed by HA 1996, Pt 7, and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 only to the reasonableness of the applicant remaining in occupation. But the local housing authority must also consider whether it was reasonable for other members of the applicant’s household to continue to occupy the accommodation as an element in determining whether it was reasonable for the applicant to remain in occupation. If there is an issue as to whether the accommodation lost would not have been reasonable for other persons in the household to continue to occupy, the local housing authority must resolve that issue. In R v Westminster City Council ex p Bishop the local housing authority was satisfied that it would have been reasonable for the applicant herself to have remained in occupation of the former home, but the court found that the issue of whether it would have been reasonable for her dependent daughter to have remained had not been properly considered by the local housing authority. Rose LJ said:

‘... accommodation can only be regarded as available for an applicant’s occupation if both she and those members of her family who normally live with her can reasonably be expected to occupy it. Accordingly, although I accept that the question of reasonableness of continued occupation within [s 191(1)] has to be looked at in relation to the applicant herself, if, in the present case, it was reasonable for her daughter to leave, it could not, in my view, be said that it was reasonable for the applicant to have remained alone. The daughter’s position was, therefore, as it seems to me, of great significance."

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 See 10.21–10.32.

13.166 Accordingly, the English Code advises that, as part of determining whether it was reasonable to have continued to occupy, a local housing authority will find it ‘necessary’ to consider the circumstances of both the applicant ‘and the household’ in each case.

1 English Code, para 9.22. See also 10.22.

13.167 There is an important distinction, prescribed by HA 1996, Pt 7 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2, between the test of ‘reasonable to continue to occupy’ to be applied where an applicant has ceased to occupy accommodation because of violence (England) or abuse (Wales) and all other cases, Where it is probable that the applicant (or a member of his or her household) would have been subject to violence or abuse if he or she had continued to occupy accommodation, as a matter of law that accommodation cannot be regarded as having been reasonable for the him or her to continue to occupy.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

13.168 In all other cases, including cases of harassment that falls short of violence or abuse, the local housing authority should consider all the circumstances in determining whether it would have been reasonable for the applicant to have continued in occupation. Those circumstances could include:

- the availability or otherwise of alternative remedies to tackle the problem that drove the applicant to leave;
- the possibility of it being reasonable for the applicant to have continued to occupy the accommodation for at least the period it would have taken to arrange alternative accommodation; and
- any other relevant matters.

13.169 The local housing authority is specifically required to consider whether the accommodation that the applicant has ceased to occupy was affordable for him or her. Obviously, whether or not accommodation was ‘affordable’ will be a critical factor where accommodation has been lost by reason of mortgage default or rent arrears. Accommodation is not reasonable for an applicant to continue to occupy if the cost of paying for it would deprive the applicant of the means to provide for ‘the ordinary necessities of life’.
Care must be taken in determining whether accommodation is affordable. In Farah v Hillingdon London Borough Council a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally was quashed where it was based on a broad assertion by the local housing authority that the applicant’s expenditure was exaggerated and that her accommodation was affordable, without any explanation of which items of expenditure could be reduced or why. A local housing authority that fails to consider affordability when determining whether or not accommodation had been reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy will find its decision quashed. The application of Children Act 2004, s 11 and the ‘best interests of the child’ principle will generally be of limited relevance to the evaluation of affordability. The income which an applicant receives from welfare benefits will be of obvious relevance in considering affordability.
But where an applicant is in receipt of benefits such as child benefit or child tax credit, there is no rule of law that such benefits are not intended to be used toward housing, or that there is no flexibility within such income for the payment of housing costs.

s 57(3)(b). See 10.107 and 18.44–18.46.
2 For example, Barker v Watford City Council (2017) July/August Legal Action, p 42, County Court at Central London, which involved a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally in circumstances where she had lost her accommodation as a result of welfare reforms which left a shortfall between her housing benefit award and her rent. The local housing authority decided that the applicant’s property was affordable, and therefore reasonable to continue to occupy, as she could have applied for discretionary housing payments. The decision was quashed on appeal. The local housing authority had failed to make any inquiries to establish whether such an application would succeed or for how long any award would be made.

13.171 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

Namibian national, had obtained accommodation under HA 1996, Pt 7 using a counterfeit passport. Her deception was later uncovered and a possession order was made against her. On a subsequent application for homelessness assistance the local housing authority took the view that she had become homeless intentionally. This decision was upheld on review and on appeal to the county court. The Court of Appeal allowed a second appeal holding that it could not have been reasonable for her to continue to occupy accommodation, which she never had any lawful right to occupy.

1 [2013] EWCA Civ 786, [2013] HLR 34, CA. The Court of Appeal in Chishimba approved and applied the earlier case of R v Exeter City Council ex p Gliddon (1984) HLR 103, QBD, where the applicants had obtained accommodation by misleading their landlord about their income.

13.172 On the face of it, the question whether it was reasonable for a particular applicant to have continued in occupation is directed to the specific circumstances of that applicant. However, HA 1996, Pt 71 and H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 each allow a local housing authority to inject a comparative element by comparing the situation that faces the applicant with the general circumstances in relation to housing in its area. A local housing authority, when determining whether it was reasonable for the applicant to have continued in occupation, is permitted (but not required) to have regard to general housing circumstances in its area2. This element of comparison is also a feature of the definition of being ‘homeless’3.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.
2 HA 1996, s 177(2); H(W)A 2014, s 57(3)(a).

13.173 Where the accommodation that the applicant has ceased to occupy was not within the local housing authority’s district, and particularly if the accommodation was outside the UK, the question for the local housing authority is not: ‘Was the accommodation reasonable to continue to occupy given general housing circumstances prevailing in the area where the accommodation was situated?’ Instead, the question is: ‘Was the accommodation reasonable to continue to occupy given the general housing circumstances prevailing in our own area?’ This necessitates a balancing exercise1 which should include consideration of the prospects available to the applicant in the accommodation that he or she has ceased to occupy, including employment prospects, the availability of welfare benefits, the applicant’s financial position, and the space and arrangement (and any overcrowding) of that accommodation2. Strict application of this test could mean that an applicant who ceases to occupy accommodation in an area of acute housing need would be best advised to direct an application for homelessness assistance to an area where the general circumstances in relation to housing are much better, in the hope of then being referred back to the first area once a duty to secure accommodation has been accepted3.

The statutory meaning 13.176

3 However, judicially developed control measures in relation to the law on referral of applications (see 14.176-14.183) have made it somewhat more difficult for applicants to expect referral back to the first area by this route.

13.174 Where a local housing authority has elected to take general housing circumstances prevailing in its district into account, the courts will be loath to interfere with its assessment of those circumstances. It is the local housing authority that is in the best position to judge the seriousness of any housing crisis in its district and to determine whether the applicant’s particular complaints about his or her previous accommodation took him or her out of the norm of difficult housing circumstances in the district1.

1 R v Brent London Borough Council ex p Bariise (1999) 31 HLR 50, CA.

13.175 For their part, applicants must be careful not to jump the gun. The question for the local housing authority is: ‘Was the accommodation reasonable for the applicant and members of his or her household to continue to occupy at the date of the applicant’s deliberate act or omission?’ So an applicant who faces the prospect, perhaps in the relatively near future, that the accommodation may become unreasonable to continue to occupy, would perhaps be best advised to wait until he or she is within 56 days of that situation crystallising and then make an application on the basis that he or she has become threatened with homelessness. However, following the decision in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council1 an applicant who ceases to occupy accommodation which subsequent events would have rendered unreasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy, will not have become homeless intentionally2.

2 In Magoury v Brent London Borough Council (2016) February Legal Action, p 46, County Court at Central London, a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally was quashed where there had been a failure to consider whether she would have become homeless anyway as a result of the benefit cap set under the Welfare Reform Act 2012, Pt 5 rendering the property unaffordable.

13.176 Although the statutory formula appears to suggest that the relevant date, when considering whether it was ‘reasonable for him to continue to occupy’, is the date when the applicant ceases to be in occupation of the accommodation, the better view is that the test should be applied as at the date of the earlier act or omission (if any) that caused the accommodation to be lost. For example, as at the date of actual eviction, the defaulting mortgage borrower may have faced such a level of repayments as to make it impossible to say that it would be reasonable to have continued in occupation1. Nevertheless, the applicant may have become homeless intentionally if it would have been reasonable to have continued in occupation at the date when the property was unwisely remortgaged or the borrowing was increased so that the level of instalments became unmanageable2.

1 See English Code, paras 6.29 and 17.45.
2 In Bellamy v Hounslow London Borough Council [2006] EWCA Civ 535, [2006] HLR 42, CA, the Court of Appeal held that it would have been reasonable for a joint legal owner to remain in the property whilst she contested any application for sale that her co-owner might make.
13.177 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

13.177 The Court of Appeal has held that the question whether it would have been reasonable for the applicant to continue in occupation of particular accommodation should be considered in light of all the facts that occurred before the applicant’s deliberate act or omission which led to the loss of the accommodation. The local housing authority must ignore later deliberate acts or omissions when deciding whether it was reasonable for the applicant to continue in occupation. Though this approach may require some adjustment following the decision in Haile v Waltham Forest London Borough Council.

13.178 In summary, for an applicant to have become homeless intentionally, the accommodation that he or she was occupying, and lost, must have been reasonable for him or her to continue to occupy. The accommodation must also have been reasonable for anyone who normally resides with the applicant as a member of his or her family and for any other person who might reasonably have been expected to reside with the applicant to continue to occupy. Accommodation cannot have been reasonable for an applicant to continue to occupy if it was probable that continued occupation would have led to violence (England) or abuse (Wales) against the applicant or a member of his or her household. In all other cases, the local housing authority has to make a decision as to whether or not the accommodation was factually reasonable for the applicant and his or her household to continue to occupy, taking account, if it chooses, of the general housing circumstances prevailing in its area.

13.179 The relevant date, when considering whether it was reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy accommodation, should, in the first instance, be the date of the deliberate act or omission that caused the loss of accommodation. But if events following the cessation of occupation would have rendered the accommodation not reasonable to continue to occupy this may suffice to sever the causal chain.

1. See 13.42–13.94

13.180 Even if the local housing authority finds that this limb of the test is satisfied, it cannot find that the applicant has become homeless intentionally unless the other five limbs are also made out.

1. See 13.36.

ENTERING INTO AN ARRANGEMENT TO CEASE TO OCCUPY ACCOMMODATION

13.181 Until 1997, an applicant could only be considered to have become homeless intentionally by falling foul of the multi-part statutory definition considered at 13.36. However, HA 1996, s 191(3) introduced a wholly new and separate class of intentional homelessness. If the statutory requirements of that category are met, then the applicant is deemed to have become homeless.
intentionally without consideration of the six-part definition. For applicants to local housing authorities in Wales this class is contained in H(W)A 2014, s 77(4).

13.182 Under these provisions, if a local housing authority decides that an applicant entered into an arrangement by which he or she was required to leave accommodation, and that the purpose of that arrangement was to enable the applicant to receive homelessness assistance, he or she will have become homeless intentionally.

1 HA 1996, s 191(3); H(W)A 2014, s 77(4).

13.183 The essential elements are that:

1. the applicant is homeless;
2. he or she had previously entered into an arrangement under which she or he would be required to leave accommodation;
3. the accommodation to which that arrangement applied would have been reasonable to continue to occupy;
4. the purpose of the arrangement was to enable the applicant to become entitled to HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 assistance; and
5. there is no other good reason for the applicant’s present homelessness.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

2 HA 1996, s 191(3); H(W)A 2014, s 77(4).

13.184 The Codes refer, by way of example, to collusion ‘with friends or relatives’ and ‘between landlords and tenants’.1

1 English Code, para 9.28; Welsh Code, para 17.30.

13.185 The statutory provision is obviously directed to preventing collusion to bring about homelessness that would result in HA 1996, Pt 7 or H(W)A 2014, Pt 2 duties. Collusion could occur in informal arrangements, between friends or relations, or in the more formal relationship between landlord and tenant. Even if there has been collusion, the applicant will not have become homeless intentionally if the accommodation given up was not reasonable for the applicant to continue to occupy. If the applicant was staying with friends or relatives, the relationship may have broken down to such an extent that the accommodation became unreasonable to continue to occupy.

1 As amended by HRA 2017, for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018.

13.186 The Codes advise that an ‘other good reason’ why an applicant may be homeless might include overcrowding, or an obvious breakdown in relations between the applicant and his or her host. In those circumstances, an applicant will not be caught by this provision.

1 English Code, para 9.29; Welsh Code, para 17.30.

13.187 Local housing authorities must be satisfied that collusion exists and should not rely on hearsay or unfounded suspicions if they are to find that the applicant became homeless intentionally under this provision. As already noted, the provision is hardly ever used in practice by local housing authorities to sustain a decision that the applicant became homeless intentionally, and it can be avoided altogether by ensuring that the application for homelessness assistance is made by someone other than the person who entered into the arrangement.
13.187 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

PARTICULAR SCENARIOS

13.188 This section of the chapter seeks to apply the above analysis of the statutory definition of ‘becoming homeless intentionally’ to common factual circumstances in which local housing authorities may be called upon to apply those tests. A number of the examples cited turn on the issue of whether the applicant’s accommodation was reasonable for him or her to continue to occupy. Readers may find it useful to refer to the more detailed exposition of this topic in Chapter 10.

1 See 10.73–10.134.

Rent or mortgage arrears

13.189 The local housing authority will need to consider why it was that the applicant accrued the rent or mortgage arrears that caused the loss of accommodation. If the applicant had simply refused to pay the rent or mortgage payments and had spent the money elsewhere, that would constitute a deliberate act (spending it) or omission (to pay it towards housing costs) necessary to satisfy the first part of the definition of becoming homeless intentionally.

13.190 But the enquiry cannot stop there, because if the accommodation was unaffordable for the applicant, in that he or she could not afford the housing costs as well as meet the ordinary necessities of life, the property would not have been reasonable for the applicant and the members of his or her household to continue to occupy. A local housing authority that fails to inquire into this will have erred in law. What constitute ‘the ordinary necessities of life’ may vary according to the individual circumstances of each applicant and is a question of fact for the local housing authority to decide. For local housing authorities in England a number of considerations relevant to this assessment are set out in a statutory order. Care must be taken in performing this assessment. In Farah v Hillingdon London Borough Council a finding that the applicant had become homeless intentionally was quashed as it was based on a broad assertion by the local housing authority that the applicant’s expenditure was exaggerated and that her accommodation was affordable, without any explanation of which items of expenditure could be reduced or why. While a local housing authority must have regard to the relevant passages of the Codes dealing with affordability, explicit reference to each specific passage will not be needed as long as the local housing authority adopts ‘the kind of analysis’ envisaged by the Codes. The application of Children Act 2004, s 11 and the ‘best interests of the child’ principle are unlikely to be relevant to the evaluation of affordability.

3 Homelessness (Suitability of Accommodation) Order, SI 1996/3204.

5 Birmingham City Council v Balog [2013] EWCA Civ 1582, [2014] HLR 14, CA per Kirchin LJ at [50].

6 Huzrat v Hounslow London Borough Council [2013] EWCA Civ 1885, [2014] HLR, CA. These principles are more likely to be relevant where the local housing authority has to make an exercise of judgment or discretion as opposed to purely factual decisions. See Nzolameso v Westminster City Council [2015] UKSC 22, [2015] HLR 22, SC per Baroness Hale at [23], discussed at 18.52–18.56, and Mohamoud v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London Borough Council [2015] EWCA Civ 780, [2015] HLR 38, CA.

13.191 Of course, the two elements of: (i) a deliberate act; and (ii) the reasonableness of continued occupation may overlap. That is particularly likely where the deliberate act of the applicant has itself arguably rendered the accommodation unaffordable. The local housing authority is entitled to consider the applicant’s financial position both when he or she first obtained the accommodation, and throughout the occupation of that property. So, for example, if the applicant had been able to afford the mortgage for the accommodation when it was first acquired, but had later taken on an additional loan that became unaffordable, that decision to extend the lending or remortgage the property could properly be described as a deliberate act which, eventually, led to the loss of accommodation. Equally, if the applicant’s financial difficulties occurred as a result of his or her raising a secured loan to finance an unsuccessful business venture (which led to inability to meet repayments), the local housing authority would be entitled to consider the prospects of that venture as they appeared at the time that the mortgage was taken out. If the applicant genuinely believed that the business venture would be sound, he or she will have acted in good faith in taking out a mortgage to finance it. However, if that judgment involved an unrealistic degree of optimism or any dishonesty, he or she will not have acted in good faith.

Two Court of Appeal decisions have upheld local housing authorities’ decisions that the taking out of a mortgage that was unaffordable was a deliberate act which subsequently rendered the applicants homeless and therefore they had become homeless intentionally.

2 R v Exeter City Council ex p Tranckle (1994) 26 HLR 244, CA; and R v Warrington Borough Council ex p Bryant (2000) October Legal Action, p 24, QBD.
13.191 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

13.192 If an applicant was receiving welfare benefits to help with the accommodation costs, the local housing authority should not simply assume that the housing costs were therefore affordable, but should still look at all the circumstances. Even if the applicant failed to use his or her available welfare benefits to pay his or her rent or mortgage, the property might still be unaffordable in any event due to the shortfall between the benefit received and the contractual rent or mortgage payments1.

13.193 If the applicant failed to apply for benefit to which he or she would have been entitled, that would generally be considered to have been a deliberate omission1. However, if he or she was genuinely unaware of his or her entitlement to benefit, he or she may not have been guilty of deliberate omission if she or he acted in good faith2.

13.194 The Codes advise that non-payment of rent due to housing benefit or universal credit delays which were beyond the applicant’s control should not generally be considered deliberate3. This guidance must refer to situations where a landlord is entitled to a mandatory order of possession, either based on rent arrears4 or as a result of a notice requiring possession5, and the court had no discretion to adjourn or refuse a possession order, even though the arrears might be due to be paid by a late determination of housing benefit entitlement6. The Welsh Code advises that ‘households should not be penalised for the loss of accommodation where it was due to an unavoidable change in their welfare benefits that led to the accommodation becoming unaffordable’7.

3 Housing Act 1988, s 21.
Particular scenarios 13.196

4 In Houghton v Sheffield City Council [2006] EWCA Civ 1799, (2007) March Legal Action, p 18, CA, the applicant was found to have become homeless intentionally even though, at the date the possession order had been made against him, he had reduced his rent arrears from £1,000 to £7. A first-instance judge found that the local housing authority’s decision was perverse, and that he had not become homeless intentionally. The Court of Appeal refused the local housing authority permission to bring a second appeal. For applicants who are homeless as a result of possession orders, see 13.201–13.206.

5 Welsh Code, para 8.30.

13.195 Occupiers in financial difficulties would do well to approach the local housing authority for help at an early stage. They certainly cannot assume that, if they leave the accommodation because of financial difficulties, they will not be found to have become homeless intentionally. If they have left, the local housing authority will consider whether leaving the accommodation was the only option available to them, ie whether or not it would have been reasonable to have continued in occupation at the date when they left. In Viackiene v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council a joint tenant who turned down the option of assistance from her landlord in replacing her impecunious co-tenant, was found to have acted deliberately when she was subsequently evicted for rent arrears. If the applicant is still in the accommodation then the prevention duty may be engaged. A failure by the local housing authority to properly perform the prevention duty may mean that the applicant should not be regarded as having become homeless intentionally when he or she subsequently leaves the accommodation. Whether or not this is the case will turn on whether or not it is the applicant’s deliberate act or the local housing authority’s failure to properly perform the prevention duty which is properly to be regarded as the operative cause of the applicant’s cessation of occupation.

2 HA 1996, s 195(2) as inserted by HRA 2017, s 4(2) for applications for homelessness assistance made to local housing authorities in England on or after 3 April 2018; H(W)A 2014, s 66(1). See 15.87–15.137 and 17.45–17.72.

13.196 The local housing authority is, accordingly, entitled to consider how desperate the applicant’s financial position was and whether, for example, his or her creditors were actually threatening to recover loans or obtain possession of the accommodation or not. The correct approach has been crisply stated in this way:

‘As a matter of common sense, it seems to me that it cannot be reasonable for a person to continue to occupy accommodation when they can no longer discharge their fiscal obligations in relation to that accommodation, that is to say, pay the rent and make the mortgage repayments, without so straining their resources as to deprive themselves of the ordinary necessities of life, such as food, clothing, heat, transport and so forth.’

13.197 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

13.197 A local housing authority is entitled to presume that, where one partner in a household accrued rent or mortgage arrears, the other partner acquiesced in that behaviour\(^1\). If, however, the applicant asserts that he or she did not acquiesce or puts forward some relevant material, the local housing authority must make inquiries into that assertion\(^2\). Where the applicant has been actively involved in the family finances, the local housing authority may be entitled to find that he or she acquiesced in a decision not to pay the rent or mortgage arrears, or to over-extrude the family budget\(^3\).

\(^1\) See the discussion on acquiescence at 13.95–13.99.

13.198 Decisions as to whether or not the applicant could have afforded to pay both the housing costs and the ordinary necessities of life apply equally to accommodation that has been lost outside the UK. If an applicant gives up accommodation overseas in order to migrate to the UK for economic reasons, the question for the local housing authority is whether or not the applicant could have afforded to pay his or her housing costs and the ordinary necessities of life in the overseas accommodation. If not, the accommodation will not have been reasonable for the applicant and members of his or her household to have continued to occupy\(^4\).

Tenants facing possession proceedings

13.199 Most landlords cannot lawfully obtain possession of tenanted premises without obtaining an order for possession\(^5\). The legal proceedings may not be the tenant’s fault, there may be no defence and the tenant may be anxious to leave before a court hearing, not least to avoid liability for court costs. If the tenant chooses to leave, that may be a perfectly reasonable thing to do, but there may still be a finding that he or she became homeless intentionally if it would have been reasonable to have remained in occupation\(^6\). The question of whether or not accommodation will be regarded as reasonable to continue to occupy in circumstances where the occupier is facing actual or imminent possession proceedings is discussed in depth at 10.110–11.116. There are few hard and fast rules\(^7\) but the English Code stresses that it is highly unlikely to be reasonable for an applicant to continue to occupy accommodation beyond the date given for possession in any possession order\(^8\) and that local housing authorities should not consider it reasonable for an applicant to remain in occupation up until the point at which a court issues a warrant or writ to enforce an order for possession\(^9\). Similarly, accommodation occupied by an applicant facing possession proceedings to which he or she has no defence may well not be reasonable to continue to occupy\(^10\).

Particular scenarios 13.202

2 In Ugiagbe v Southwark London Borough Council [2009] EWCA Civ 31, [2009] HLR 35, CA, an assured shorthold tenant left the premises before the landlord served a Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice or started possession proceedings. Having been told by the landlord to leave, she sought advice from a local housing authority advice centre which told her to go to the Homeless Persons Unit who would put her into temporary accommodation. The advice centre did not tell her that she had the right to remain in the property until the landlord obtained a possession order. Had she gone to the Homeless Persons Unit, she would have been advised accordingly. The Court of Appeal found that she was ignorant of a relevant fact (her security of tenure) and that her failure to obtain that advice had been in good faith. See also Bury Metropolitan Borough Council v Gibbons [2010] EWCA Civ 327, [2010] HLR 33, CA.

3 Save that an applicant who is re-applying within two years of acceptance of a private rented sector offer (see 16.153–16.179) who has been served with a valid Housing Act 1988, s 21 notice will be deemed to be homeless from the expiry of the notice: HA 1996, s 195A(2).

4 English Code, para 6.36.

5 English Code, para 6.37.

6 English Code, para 6.35; Welsh Code, para 8.31.

13.200 Of course, the local housing authority is also entitled to take into account the landlord’s reasons for seeking possession and this issue may be critical in determining whether an applicant in these circumstances has become homeless intentionally. If a deliberate act or omission on the part of the applicant led the landlord to seek possession, and the accommodation was reasonable to continue to occupy at the time of that deliberate act or omission, then the fact that the subsequent possession proceedings rendered the property unreasonable to continue to occupy will not save the applicant from a finding that he or she became homeless intentionally.

Loss of accommodation as a result of a possession order

13.201 As already referred to, most owner-occupiers and tenants of rented accommodation are entitled not to be evicted unless a possession order has been made against them. In one sense, occupiers who leave or are evicted from property as a result of a possession order cannot be said to have become homeless intentionally. They have been required to leave by a court, against their wishes.

1 See 10.56–10.65.

13.202 However, applying the ‘effective cause’ and ‘reasonable likelihood’ tests described above, local housing authorities are entitled to consider the reasons for the bringing of possession proceedings. Possession proceedings themselves fall into three categories:

- claims for possession where the reason is said to be some fault by the tenant;
- claims for possession where there is no obligation on the landlord to show fault; and
- claims for possession brought by lenders.

1 See 13.119–13.123.

13.202 Becoming Homeless Intentionally

13.203 The Court of Appeal has declined an invitation to hold that a local housing authority is always obliged to accept what is said on the face of a possession order (such as the correct figures for the arrears)\(^1\). However, it would be unusual for a local housing authority to come to a different decision from the facts as determined by the judge and recorded on the face of the order. There may, however, be a number of matters that were not raised before or considered by a judge hearing the possession claim that could be relevant to the question of whether the occupier has become homeless intentionally.

13.204 Where the claim for possession is brought by a landlord who alleges fault on the part of a secure or assured tenant\(^1\), the court hearing the claim for possession will determine whether there has been fault, so as to entitle the landlord to possession, and will normally consider whether it is reasonable to make an order for possession and whether the order should be postponed on terms\(^2\). A tenant evicted as a result of one of these ‘fault-based’ grounds for possession may well find that the local housing authority decides that he or she has become homeless intentionally for the same reason that the court decided to make a possession order\(^3\). Common scenarios include where the tenant has accrued rent arrears or has been found responsible for nuisance behaviour\(^4\).

Normally, in these fault-based claims for possession, the tenant will have had the opportunity to put everything that is relevant to a decision as to whether he or she had become homeless intentionally to the judge hearing the possession claim, and so it would be unusual for there to be additional relevant facts to be put before the local housing authority.

Under Housing Act 1985, s 84A (as inserted by the Anti-Social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014) or Sch 2, Pt 1 (secure tenants) or Housing Act 1988, Sch 2, Grounds 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 14ZA, 15, or 17 (assured tenants).

The exceptions are Housing Act 1985, s 84A and Housing Act 1988, Sch 2, Ground 8, where the landlord is entitled to possession if the statutory conditions are satisfied: ie the court has no discretion.

An exception to this might be where a tenant was evicted for high levels of rent arrears caused by events beyond his or her control.

For cases concerning rent arrears, see: R v Wandsworth London Borough Council ex p Hawthorne [1994] 1 WLR 1442, CA; R v Brent London Borough Council ex p Baruwa (1997) 29 HLR 915, CA; and R v Newham London Borough Council ex p Campbell (1994) 26 HLR 183, QBD (where the real cause of homelessness was not the reason for the making of the possession order). For cases concerning nuisance behaviour, see: Devenport v Salford City Council (1983) 8 HLR 54, CA; R v Swansea City Council ex p John (1983) 9 HLR 56, QBD (where the tenant had acquiesced in her partner’s nuisance behaviour and so had become homeless intentionally); Griffiths v St Helens Metropolitan Borough Council [2004] 142 Housing Aid Update, St Helens County Court, noted at Madge & Madge-Wyld Housing Law Casebook (LAG, 6th edn, 2015), T23.5 (where the tenant had tried to stop her children’s misconduct and had not become homeless intentionally); and Walcot v Lambeth London Borough Council [2006] EWCA Civ 809, (2006) September Legal Action, p 14, CA. In Sheppard v Richmond-upon-Thames Royal London Borough Council [2012] EWCA Civ 302, (2012) June Legal Action, p 36, CA, the possession order had been made because of the tenant’s breach of her tenancy agreement by refusing to allow gas safety checks.
Particular scenarios 13.208

13.205 Where the possession claim has been brought without any need for the landlord to show that the tenant is at fault, such as possession proceedings brought under Housing Act 1988, s 21 against assured shorthold tenants, or proceedings by local housing authorities against introductory, demoted or non-secure tenants, then very little information may have been put before the judge. The local housing authority is entitled to consider the reasons for the landlord’s decision to bring (and continue) possession proceedings and, of course, must hear the tenant’s side of the story. If those reasons are because of the fault of the tenant, he or she may have become homeless intentionally, even though the possession claim was not brought on any of the fault-based grounds¹.

See Houghton v Sheffield City Council [2006] EWCA Civ 1799, (2007) March Legal Action, p 18, where a local housing authority was wrong to find that a tenant who had reduced arrears from £1,000 to £7, but was still subject to a possession order, had become homeless intentionally.
